Now as to Theſe Three Towers, the Height was Prodigious; and yet the Place they were rais'd upon, made it ſeem much more then it was. For the Old Wall they ſtood upon, was it ſelf erected upon a very High Piece of Ground: and Theſe Turrets again were advanc'd upon the Top of a Mountain that was yet Thirty Cubits Higher then the Ancient Wall. Neither were they leſs Admirable for the Materials they were made of, then for the Structure. The Stones were neither Common, nor of a Weight to be remov'd with Hands: but of White Marble cut-out into Planks of Twenty Cubits long; Ten in Breadth, and Five Cubits Deep; and ſo Artificially put together, that there were no Joints to be ſeen: but Every Diſtinct Tower look'd like One Entire Piece.

The Palace Royal.

This was on the North-ſide of the City; and juſt within it there ſtood a Royal Palace, ſo Rich and Curious, that it is not for the Tongue of Man to Expreſs it: beſide that it was all Encloſed with a Wall of Thirty Cubits in Height, and Turrets of the Beſt Work and Maſters, planted at Equal diſtances one from another round about it; with Splendid Lodgings and Treating-Rooms to receive a Hundred Perſons. There was an Incredible Collection of the Choiceſt Marbles for Variety and Beauty, that could be gotten for Mony. The Beams and Timbers that ſupported the Roofs were, for Length and Thickneſs, beyond Imagination; and ſo were the Ornamental Additions toward the finiſhing of the Work. There were a World of Chambers with Commodious Paſſages, and Contrivances Innumerable; for ſight, as well as for Convenience: the Whole being magnificently ſet-out and furniſh'd, furniſh'd, with all the Advantages of Gold and Silver, and whatever elſe was Precious. There were alſo Porches and Galleries in abundance, leading in a kind of Circle from One to Another, and in each of them a Row of Pillars. Now for the Diſtances betwixt Thoſe Pillars that lay to the Open Air, nothing could be more Agreeable then the Proſpect of ſo many Groves and Nurſeries of ſo many ſeveral Plants; long and pleaſant Walks, beſet with Ciſterns, Fountains, Pipes and Brazen Figures to ſpout out Water; with Volaries of Tame Pigeons gathering about it for Refreſhment. But it is Impoſſible for any Man to do This Palace Right, in the Deſcription of it: beſide that my Heart bleeds at the very Thought of the Story; to conſider what a Devaſtation hath been made here by an Impious Crew of Incendiaries and Traytours. For This Conflagration was not the Work of the Romans, but of a Band of Wicked Miſcreants; as we have already obſerv'd upon the Beginning of This Sedition: who burnt all from the Fort Antonia; and then carrying it on to the Palace, ſet Fire to the Roofs of the Three Towers. A Diſmal Conflagration.

The Temple was built, as I ſaid, upon a very Hard Rock; which was ſo ſteep on all hands, that at Firſt there was ſcarce Ground ſufficient on the Top of it for the Temple, and the Encloſure that was to be about it. But when King Solomon Erected This Fabrick, he Order'd the running-up of a Wall to the Eaſtward of it, to keep-up the Earth: and having ſo far ſecur'd it, he built a Porch upon the Rampart. There was not as yet any Other Fortification; but the People carrying up Earth from time to time afterwards to ſupply the Defect, the Hill came by degrees to be Enlarged. They brake down ſome time after This the North-Wall, and took-in as much Ground there too, as ſerv'd in time to come for the Foundation of the Whole Temple.

The Deſign ſucceeding ſo much beyond Expectation, they Encompaſs'd the Hill with Three Walls; but with a Prodigious Expence of Time and Treaſure: for it was not only a Work of many Ages; but the Whole Maſs of Religious Oblations from all Parts of the World, to the Honour and Service of God and his Worſhip, was ſpent upon This Undertaking; reckoning the Charge as well of the Upper as of the Lower-Temple: which Latter was Erected upon a Foundation of Three Hundred Cubits Deep; and in ſome Places more: but the Depth did not appear in regard that the Vally was now fill'd-up to the very Level of the Streets in the City. The Stones provided for This Mighty Undertaking were of Forty Cubits in Length; which gave them to Underſtand that there was Nothing Impoſſible where there was Mony and Good Will; and that Conſtancy, Time and Patience could Work Miracles.

As the Foundations were Wonderful, ſo the Dignity of the Superſtructure was not Inferiour to That of the Ground-Work. The Galleries above were all Double; upheld by Pillars of White Marble all of a piece, and Five and Twenty Cubits in Height; and Wainſcotted with Cedar: which for the Curioſity of the Work, and the Smoothneſs of the Grain, was a Delightful Entertainment to the Spectatour; without need of any Additional Ornaments either of Painting or Carving. They were all Thirty Cubits over, and Six Stadia the Whole Compaſs of them; including the Tower Antonia. In the Open Air, where there was no Covering over-head, the Ground was Pav'd and Chequer'd with all ſorts of Stones: but the Way to the ſecond Temple was lin'd on each hand with Stone-Baluſtres, delicately Wrought and Poliſht, of Three Cubits High. In This Paſſage there were alſo ſeveral Pillars orderly diſpos'd, with Inſcriptions and Precepts upon them in Latin and Greek, upon the Subject of Continence and Chaſtity; and forbidding Strangers to Enter into That Holy Place. For the Second Temple was call'd Holy, and it was Fourteen Steps above the Firſt. The Figure of it was Four-ſquare, with a Wall of its Own: which though Forty Cubits without, was yet but Five and Twenty Cubits within; the Place being cover'd with the Steps that led to Mount it. Now This Wall being built upon an Advance-Ground with Stairs to it, Part of the Inſide was ſo blinded with the Mountain that it could not be Diſcern'd. The Situation, Magnificence, and Structure of the Temple.

At the Top of Theſe Fourteen Steps, there was a Plain Level of Three Hundred Cubits up to the Wall; and from thence, Five Steps more to the Gates of the Temple. There were alſo Four from the North, as many from the South, and Two from the Eaſt.

The Women had an Oratory, or a Worſhipping-Place by Themſelves; with a Partition-Wall to it, and Two Gates; one to the South; the other to the North; which were the Two only Paſſages of Entrance to the Women: Neither were they permitted to paſs their Own. For That Place was Free Indifferently to Women, Inhabitants, as well as Strangers that came thither upon Devotion. The Weſt ſide of it was a Dead Wall, without any Door at all. Betwixt the aforeſaid Gates, The Womens Oratory.

and over-againſt the Wall within near the Treaſury, there were Galleries with Stately Pillars to ſupport them; Plain and Simple, and not much Inferiour to Thoſe below.

Some of Theſe Gates were plated all over with Gold and Silver; Poſts, Front and all: but there was One, without the Temple, of Corinthian Braſs; which is much the Richer Mettal of the Three. There were Double Doors to Every Gate; each Thirty Cubits High, and Fifteen Broad. They were Wider within; and Withdrawing-Rooms on each hand, of Thirty Cubits Square after the manner of Turrets: and upward of Twenty Cubits High, and each of them born up with Pillars of Twelve Cubits in Thickneſs; the Other Gates being of the ſame Dimenſions in Proportion. As to the Corinthian Portal on the Eaſt-ſide of the Temple where the Women came-in, it was undoubtedly the Largeſt, and the moſt Magnificent of them all; for it was Fifty Cubits High; the Gates, Forty; and the Gold and Silver-Plates upon it more ſubſtantial then Thoſe that Alexander, the Father of Tiberius, laid upon the Other Nine. There were Fifteen Steps from the Wall that parted the Men and the Women, to the Great Gate: which was Five ſhort of Thoſe that led to the Other Gates.

The Holy Sanctuary.

The Temple it ſelf: That is to ſay; the Holy Temple, or Sanctuary, was placed in the Middle with Twelve Stairs up to it. The Height of it was a Hundred Cubits; and the Breadth, as many in the Front; but backward, it wanted Forty of the Number. For upon the Entrance, there were Two Additions rais'd (like Two Shoulders) of Twenty Cubits each. The Height of the Firſt Gate was Seventy Cubits, and Five and Twenty over; but it had no Doors to it, being a Figure of Heaven, Open and Viſible to the Whole World. The Front and Outſides of it were all over Guilt; and nothing to be ſeen in the Inſide of the Temple neither, which had not likewiſe a Dazling Luſtre.

The Inner-Part of it, with the Partitions.

The Inner-Part of it was divided into Two Partitions. The Firſt of them in ſight was Open to the Top; which was Ninety Cubits in Height; Forty in Length, and Twenty Over. The Inſide of the Gate was, as I ſaid, plated all over with Gold, and the Wall Guilt every where about it. There were alſo Leaves and Branches of Vines over-head; and Huge Cluſters of Grapes that hung dangling down, betwixt Five and Six Foot Deep, all of Gold too. The Other Partition of the Temple being ciel'd above, appear'd the Lower of the Two. The Doors to it were of Gold; Five and Fifty Cubits in Height, and Sixteen Broad, with a Piece of Babylonian Tapiſtry hanging before them, of the ſame Dimenſions: and interwoven with Blew, Purple and Scarlate, moſt Artificially put together, and wrought to Admiration. And the Mixture was not a Bare Curioſity neither, but a Myſtical Alluſion to the Four Elements; either by the Colours, or by the Matter they were made of: the Scarlate repreſenting the Fire; the Silk, the Earth that produced it; the Azure, the Air; and the Purple, the Sea from whence it comes. So that This Veil or Hanging was, in Little, an Embleme of the Univerſe; only Excepting the Celeſtial Signs.

This Entrance leads you into the Lower Part of the Temple: The Height and Length of it Sixty Cubits; and the Breadth, Twenty. This Length of Sixty Cubits was then ſubdivided into Two Unequal Parts; One of Forty Cubits, and the Other of Twenty. The Former Part of Forty Cubits, had in it the Three Wonderful Rarities that had been Celebrated over the Whole World; the Candleſtick, the Table, and the Altar of Incenſe. The Candleſtick had Seven Branches, (all out of the ſame Stem) with Seven Lights repreſenting the Seven Planets. The Twelve Loaves of Shew-Bread upon the Table pointed at the Twelve Signs in the Zodiack, and the Courſe of the Year. By the Thirteen ſorts of Perfumes in the Cenſer upon the Altar of Incenſe (divers of Theſe Odours being Extracted out of the Deep of the Inhoſpitable Sea) we are given to Underſtand that God is Maſter of the Univerſe, and that all things are made for his Honour and Service.

The Candleſtick, the Table, and the Altar: Three Pieces of Art.

The Inner Part of the Temple being only Twenty Cubits in Height, was divided by a Veil alſo from the Other, and nothing at all in it: neither was any Man permitted to Enter in, or ſo much as look into it; and it was called the Sanctuary or the Holy of Holies. Upon the ſides of This Lower Temple there were ſeveral Lodgings, leading from One to Another; with Three Stories over-head, and Paſſages into them out of the Great Portal. Now the Upper Part being Narrower then the Other, could not have the Convenience of the ſame Order of Chambers; but it was Forty Cubits Higher, though the leſs Splendid of the Two. The Height, in fine, upon the Whole, was a Hundred Cubits; and the Plan only Sixty.

The Outſide of the Temple.

The Beauty and Curioſity of the Temple, on the Outſide, was Agreeable and Charming beyond Imagination: being Fac'd every where with ſubſtantial Golden Plates, that ſparkled like the Morning-Sun; and every jot as dazling to the Eye to gaze gaze upon them. Where there was no Guilding; the Structure was all so delicately White, that it look'd at a distance to Travellers like a Marble-Mountain, or a Pillar of Snow.

The Roof. The Roof of the Temple was Cover'd and Arm'd all over with pointed Spikes of Gold, to keep-off the Birds from Nestling upon it and Fouling it. There were a great many Stones in This Building, of Forty Five Cubits long, Five in Height, and Six Cubits Broad.

The Altar before the Temple. The Altar before the Temple was Fifteen Cubits High; and Forty Square; and Four Angles to it like Horns. The Ascent to This Altar was on the South-side, and very Difficult by reason of the Declivity of the Passage. There came no Hammer upon it, nor any Iron-Tool in the Working of it.

There was a Partition rais'd of Stone-work; curiously Wrought, and of One Cubit in Height: enclosing the Temple and the Altar, and separating the People from the Priests.

No Unclean Persons admitted into it. No People troubled with the Gonorrhæa, and no Lepers were suffer'd, either in the Temple, or in the City. No Women to come near the Temple in the Time of their Courses; and even when they are over, not to pass further then as we have said above. Neither were Men allow'd to Enter the Inner-Temple without being first Purify'd, and even Then also, they were not to Mingle with the Priests.

Those of the (a) Sacerdotal Race that were hinder'd by any defect from the Exercise of their Function, took their Places yet with Those that had none, and had their Allowances in Common with the rest; only under the Distinction of a Lay-Habit: for no Man is allow'd to wear the Vestments of a Priest, but he that actually Executes the Office.

The Priests Exemplary in Life and Conversation. The Priests that serve in the Temple, and at the Altar, were to be Persons Exemplary in their Lives and Conversations, and without either Scandal or Blemish: their Cloathing, Fine Linnen, Temperate and Abstemious in their Eating and Drinking, for the Reverence of the Holy Function. The High-Priest went-up with the Other Priests to the Altar, every Seventh-Day, and upon the First day of every Month, and upon all Publique Anniversary Festivals: where he Officiated in a Veil girt about him, and hanging down over part of his Thighs; with a Linnen Veil under it that reach'd down to the Ground: and over Both These, he wore a Large Violet-colour'd Garment, Fring'd at the Bottom; and Golden Bells and Pomegranates interchangeably fasten'd to it: the Bells representing the Thunder; and the Other, the Lightning. His Pectoral was ty'd about him with Parti-colour'd Ribbons; as Gold-colour, Purple, Scarlate, Linnen and Violet: which were the Colours also, as I have said already, of the Veils of the Temple.

The Priests Veil.

And the Mystery of it.

The Ephod. The Mixture of the Ephod was the same too; only more of Gold in it; and, in the Shape of it, not much Unlike that of a Breast-piece. It was bound together with Two Golden Buckles in the Figure of Aspes, and set with Sardonyx-Stones, the Largest and the Richest that were to be got; with the Names of the Twelve Tribes of Israel inscrib'd upon them. There were also Four Rows of Precious Stones, hanging down in the Order of Three and Three in a Row: That is to say; a Sardonyx, Topaz, Emerald, Carbuncle, Jaspar, Saphire, Agat, Amethyst, a Lynx-Stone, Onyx, a Beryl and a Chrysolite; with the same Names upon them respectively, as before.

He had upon his Head a Silken Tiara, with a Crown over it of Violet Colour; and Another Crown over That, of Gold; with the Sacred Vowels Engraven upon it.

The High-Priests (b) every-day's Habit was not so Rich and Magnificent; but This was only made use of for the Solemnity of Once a Year, and That for Him alone too; and when he Enter'd into the Holy of Holies: which Day was strictly Observ'd as a Religious Fast. But I shall have Occasion hereafter, and elsewhere, to be more Particular upon the Subject of the City, the Temple, and our Laws and Customs; as there shall be Occasion for it.

The Fort of Antonia. The Fortress of Antonia was built in an Angle betwixt the Two Galleries of the First Temple, looking West and North. It was rais'd upon a Rock of Fifty Cubits in Height; Inaccessibly Steep on all hands; and, in fine, Herod's Master-piece, both for Magnificence, and Contrivance. The Rock was Faced and Crusted with Thin Scales of Marble from the Bottom to the Top, both for Ornament, and for Security-sake; for it was so slippery, that there was no going up or down. This Tower was enclos'd with a Wall only of Three Cubits High; and within that Compass

ſtood the Caſtle of Antonia, of Forty Cubits; with the State, Splendour, and Conveniences of a Court; Lodgings, and Offices for all Purpoſes; ſpacious Halls, and Places of Parade for the Uſe and Service of a Camp. So that for Matter of Neceſſaries, it was rather a City then a Fort; and for the Magnificence, it look'd like a Palace. It was, upon the Whole, the Reſemblance of a Tower, and Encompaſſed with Four Other Towers at Equal Diſtances one from Another, and one from Every Corner: Three of them of Fifty Cubits in Height; and the Fourth that look'd to the South and Eaſtward, of Seventy Cubits: and from thence they had the View of the Whole Temple. From the Place where the Galleries join'd, there were upon the Right and Left Two Pair of Stairs; which ſerv'd for a Paſſage to the Soldiers into the Temple: for when the Romans were Maſters of Jeruſalem, there were Guards Poſted ſtill upon That Quarter to prevent Seditions, upon their Publique Feſtivals and Meetings. The Temple commanded the City, as Antonia commanded the Temple. This Place had a Guard upon it, and Herod's Palace was as good as a Fort to the Upper-Town. The Mountain Bezeth (the Top Mountain of them all) was cut-off, as I ſaid before, from Antonia, and join'd to Part of the New-Town: beſide that it was the only Blind upon the Northſide of the Temple. This is all I have to ſay at preſent of the City and the Walls; being to ſpeak further of them hereafter.

Simon Fifteen Thouſand Strong.

SImon had a Body of Ten Thouſand Men, beſide Idumæans; which were Five Thouſand more; Fifteen Thouſand in all: Ten Thouſand of them under Fifty Captains, and Simon Himſelf the Commander in Chief; the Other Five Thouſand under Twenty Officers; and Theſe were the moſt Daring Mutinous Part of the Whole Faction. The Principals among them were James the Son of Soſas, and Simon the Son of Cathlas.

John with Six Thouſand Men Poſſeſs'd of the Temple.

John was now in Poſſeſſion of the Temple with Six Thouſand Men under the Command of Twenty Captains; and there came in to him (all Quarrels apart) Four and Twenty Hundred of the Zelotes; who liſted themſelves under Eleazar, whom they had formerly ſerv'd, and Simon the (a) Son of Jair.

Simon Maſter of the Upper-Town;

In This Oppoſition of the Two Parties the People were a Common Booty, and the leaſt Seditious were a Prey to them Both. Simon was now Maſter of the Upper-Town, and the Great Wall as far as Cedron, and ſo likewiſe of the Old Wall that runs out to Siloe; and then bending to the Eaſtward goes on to the Palace of Monobazus.

And Monobazus of the Hill Acra.

This Monobazus was the King of the Adiabenians, a People beyond Euphrates. He was poſſeſs'd alſo of the Hill Acra, the Seat of the Lower-Town, as far as the Royal Reſidence of Helena the Mother of Monobazus.

John all this while had the Command of the Temple, and ſome Places about it; but for Ophlas, and the Vale of Cedron, and what lay betwixt Him and Simon, it was all conſum'd to Aſhes, and of no Other Uſe or Service then for a Field of Battle.

The Romans at the very Gates, and the Sedition in the Town as Hot yet as ever.

The Romans were at This time drawn-up before the very Gates; and yet the Sedition within the Walls as Hot as ever. The Enemy's preſſing upon them brought them now and then, by Fits, to their Senſes again: but upon the leaſt Interval of a Breathing-while, they preſently relaps'd and brake-out into Factions and Diviſions among Themſelves; contending afreſh again upon the Foot of their Former Pretenſions. Now This was the Greateſt Service to the Romans they could have done them in the World; for they treated One Another Worſe then they were treated by the Common Enemy: having This Comfort yet in their Miſery, that they had no New Calamity to Fear. They were put to harder Extremities, 'tis true, before the City was totally deſtroy'd; but the Romans did yet a Greater Thing then the Taking of the Place: for whereas the Sedition did but deſtroy the City, they deſtroy'd the very Sedition; Which was a far Greater Work then the bare Demoliſhing of the Walls. So that, upon the Short of the Whole Matter, the Jews Themſelves brought This Ruine upon their Own Heads, and the Romans were only the Executioners of Divine Juſtice upon them for their Impieties; as will better appear in what follows.

Titus takes a View of the Place where to give the Aſſault.

While Matters were at This Paſs in the City, Titus with a Party of Choice-Horſe took the Whole Tour of the Walls; to conſider upon what Quarter it lay moſt expos'd to an Attacque. There was no coming at it he ſaw, for either Horſe or Foot, by the way of the Valleys; and on the Other ſide, the Firſt Wall was ſo Firm, that there was no good to be done upon it by Battery. He bethought himſelf a while, and after a little pauſe pitch'd upon that part of the Line toward the Sepulchre of John the High-Prieſt, as the Place that lay the moſt Expoſed to an Aſſault; both as the Firſt Wall was Lower there, and likewiſe cut-off from the Second Wall: having neglected the Fortifying of That Place, in regard that the New City was not as yet Peopled enough to attend it: beſide that they might paſs from thence to the Third Wall, and ſo to the Upper-Town; and, with the Help of Antonia, take the very Temple it ſelf.

Titus's Friend Nicanor, at the ſame time baſely Wounded for Adviſing a Peace.

While Titus was a conſidering and weighing Theſe Things within Himſelf, a Particular Friend of his, Nicanor, by Name, was wounded in the Left Shoulder by an Arrow from the Wall; as he was labouring with Joſeph (being an Excellent Speaker) to bring the Jews over to deſire a Peace. Titus was ſo Tranſported at the Ungrateful Bitterneſs of Theſe People toward their Beſt Friends and Adviſers, that he immediately took up a Reſolution of beſieging the Town in Form, and taking it by Force. Upon This, he gave the Soldiers the Pillage of the Suburbs; ordering them to make uſe of the Rubbiſh and Ruines for Works and Platforms. He divided his Army into Three Bodies; aſſigning to all his Troups their Work and Stations. He diſpos'd of his Archers and Slingers upon the Mounts, in the Middle of the Body; with Engines to caſt Stones and other Shot before them; which ſerv'd them to Two Purpoſes, either to repel the Enemy's Sallies, or to hold them in play upon the Walls. The Trees were all cut down, and the Suburbs laid Naked in an Inſtant; and the Timber employ'd upon Fortifications. All Hands, in fine, were at work on the Roman ſide; and the Jews were not Idle neither.

John's People do their Parts; but He Himſelf dares not Appear.

The People that had been formerly Expos'd to Robberies and Murders, finding the Faction ſo wholly taken-up in their Own Defence, began to flatter themſelves with ſome Proſpect of Eaſe, in the very Hope that the Romans Themſelves if they got the better of it, would effectually revenge their Quarrel; by putting it into their Power to do themſelves Juſtice. John's People made a very vigorous Oppoſition to the Beſiegers; but He Himſelf durſt not ſtir out of the Temple for fear of Simon. Now Simon being poſted next the Enemy, was never out of Action. He planted all along the Wall the Shot and Engines that he had formerly taken from Ceſtius, and out of the Fort of Antonia. But his People made little Advantage of it, for want of Underſtanding the Right Uſe and Menage of them; only ſome little Skill they had got from here and there a Deſerter among them. But yet the Jews made uſe of them however, to gall the Enemy from the Ramparts, with Stones and Arrows: ſallying out alſo in ſmall Parties, and coming to Handy-Blows with the Romans: who on the Other ſide cover'd their Workmen with Hurdles and Gabions.

A Combat, and the Manner of it.

The Roman Legions had every one of them Wonderful Machines, to diſappoint the Inſults of an Enemy: the Tenth eſpecially; not only for the caſting of Larger Stones, but for throwing them further. Every Stone was of a Talent weight; and did Execution not only at hand, but to the Top of the Walls or Ramparts; though it were at a Furlong diſtance: and where it fell, it carry'd a whole File before it. The Jews were ſeveral Ways advertis'd of Theſe Stones: Firſt, as they were White and eaſily diſcern'd in their Paſſage; Secondly, by the Noiſe they made in the Air; and Thirdly, by the Notice that was given from thoſe that were ſet to watch them: for there were People plac'd up and down upon the Towers to Obſerve the Playing of Theſe Engines; and ſtill as any of them were Diſcharg'd, the Watch-Man cry'd out in his Mother's Tongue, [THE STONE COMES;] which gave Every Man time to look to himſelf, and get out of Harms-way. The Romans after This, diſcolour'd the Stones that they might not be diſcover'd in their Courſe; and by the Help of That Invention, kill'd ſeveral Jews ſometimes at One Blow. But This was not enough yet to divert the Jews from Oppoſing the Progreſs of the Romans in their Fortifications; for they perſiſted Night and Day in doing all that was poſſible to be done, by Policy and Courage, to Obſtruct their Proceedings.

So ſoon as the Romans had compleated their Works, they caſt down a Line and Plummet to take meaſure of the Diſtance betwixt the Mount and the Wall: which could not be done otherwiſe; for there was no abiding near it for the Shot and Darts that were Shower'd down from above. When they found the Place juſt fit for the Rams, Titus order'd them to be brought up, and the Other Machines to be advanced nearer the Wall, that they might have more liberty to play: and hereupon, they ſet Three Batteries at Work at a time upon Three ſeveral Parts of the Wall. The Terrible Knocking of Theſe Engines was heard all over the City, with the Cries of Citizens upon the Terrour of it; and the Faction it ſelf trembling under the Apprehenſion. The Divided Members of This Sedition, finding themſelves now to be all under One Common Danger, bethought themſelves of joining in One Common Defence: crying out one to another, that at This rate they were only doing the Enemies Work; and if they could not agree among Themſelves for good and all, it would behoove them however at preſent to join unanimouſly in a Confederacy againſt the Romans. Simon, upon This, ſent away a Herald to thoſe that had ſhut themſelves up in the Temple; with Commiſſion to tell them, that ſo many of them that had a mind to quit the Temple, and advance to the Wall, they had Free Liberty to do it. John did not much Confide in the Good Faith of the Meſſage; but left his People to their Own Freedom.

The Factions Propoſe Joyning in One Common Defence.

The Factions piec'd immediately upon This Overture; and, all Old Grudges apart, march'd directly up to the Walls in a Full Body. So ſoon as they had poſted themſelves for their Purpoſe, they fell to Work with their Fires, and Torches, upon the Roman Engines: preſſing furiouſly alſo upon thoſe that had the Ordering of them, and plying them with Darts and Other Weapons of Offence without Intermiſſion. In This Heat of Rage and Reſolution, the Jews leap'd down deſperately from the Walls in Troups, upon the very Engines; tore-off their Covers, and brake-in upon the Guards that were ſet to defend them.

They March immediately up to the Walls in a Full Body, and fall Deſperately upon the Roman Engeniers.

Titus ſupports the Machines.

But Titus, that never fail'd his Friends in a time of need, clapt a Party of Horſe and Archers upon the Guard of the Machines to keep off the Fire, and holding the Jews in play upon the Walls, to leave the Engineers at liberty to do Execution. But all This Battery made little or no Impreſſion yet: only the Ram of the Fifth Legion ſhook the Corner of a Tower, but without any Damage to the Wall it ſelf; for the Tower being much Higher then the Wall, it tumbled down without drawing any Part of the Wall after it.

The Jews, having for ſome ſhort time intermitted their Sallies, the Romans took it to be either out of Fear or Wearineſs; and ſo went their way careleſly up and down as in a State of Security. But the Jews taking notice of This from the Town, and how the Romans were Scatter'd and out of Order; they made a Furious Excurſion upon them out of a Sally-Port from the Tower Hippicos: ſet Fire to their Works, and in the Heat of This Succeſs, puſh'd the Beſiegers back to their very Camp. The Alarum paſs'd immediately through the Whole Army, and the Romans far and near drew preſently together to the Relief of their Companions: but the Daring Hardineſs of the Jews was not yet able to ſupport it ſelf againſt the Diſcipline of the Romans. They over-ran at firſt all that they met withall; attacquing Thoſe that they found in a Body. But the Pinch of the Conflict was about the Engines; how to burn them on the one ſide, and to ſave them on the Other. The Air was torn with Uncertain Outcries from Both Parts: and This Encounter, upon the Shock, coſt many a Brave Man's Life. But the Jews were much the Bolder and the more Adventurous of the Two. The Fire had by This time laid hold of the Machines: and they had certainly been deſtroy'd with all that belong'd to them, if they had not been ſupported by a Choice Party of Alexandrian Troups; who behav'd themſelves That Day to a Miracle, and had a Great Share in the Honour of the Action.

There was a Jew taken Alive upon This Encounter: whom Titus order'd to be Crucify'd in ſight of the Walls; to try how far ſuch an Exemplary Terrour might work upon them. But for all This, after his Departure, One John, an Idumæan Officer, as he was talking with a Soldier of his Acquaintance before the Walls, was ſhot with an Arrow quite thorough the Heart by an Arabian; to the Great Grief of all that knew him, Jews and Zelotes: having the Reputation of a Worthy Man to all Purpoſes, both for Wiſdom and Valour.

THERE happen'd the next Next a moſt Dreadful Tumult in the Roman Camp. Titus had Order'd the raiſing of Three Towers of Fifty Cubits in Height, to be Erected upon Three ſeveral Ramparts; ſo as to have the Command of the Town-Wall. In the Dead of the Night One of Theſe Towers fell of it ſelf down to the Ground; with ſo Dreadful a Clatter, that the Surprize Frighten'd and Alarum'd the Whole Army. The Romans could not tell what to make of it; but ran preſently to their Arms, and put all the Legions into a Confuſion, and a kind of Uproar. Some Phancy'd the Jews might have a Hand in it: ſome, in fine, ſurmiſing One Thing; ſome, Another; till they came in the End (no Enemy appearing) to have a Jealouſie one of another, and Every Man to demand the [WORD] of his next Neighbour, with the ſame Formality and Strictneſs as if the Jews had been in poſſeſſion of the Camp. They lay under the Conſternation of This Panick Terrour; till Titus had learnt out the whole Matter, and made the Truth of it Publique by Proclamation over the Whole Camp. This, with much a-do, put an End to That Commotion.

The Jews ſtand firm againſt all Difficulties but the Towers.

The Jews all this while kept up their Hearts againſt all Other Difficulties but That of the Towers; which was in truth not to be diſputed or avoided. From Thoſe Turrets they were gall'd with all ſorts of Machines, Archers, Slingers, &c. and no Remedy. For Firſt it was impoſſible for them to carry up their Platforms to the Height of Theſe Towers; and Then, they were too Strong and too Heavy to be Over-turn'd: and there was no burning of them neither; for they were all plated over with Iron. So that all the Jews had to do was to get out of the reach of the Roman Darts, Arrows, and Stones; without making any Oppoſition to the Force of the Rams; which, by little and little, and the Shock of repeated Strokes, in the Concluſion did the Work. The Romans had one Terrible Machine, which the Jews call'd Nicon, or the Conquerour; and it was This Ram that made the Firſt Breach. The Beſieged were by This time ſo ſpent with Watching and Fighting, (having been upon Duty all Night) that betwixt Levity and Ill Advice, they came to an Agreement among themſelves to quit the Firſt Wall; having Two Other yet to truſt to. Upon This, they retir'd, and the Romans mounted the Breach that Nicon had made: and after That open'd the Gates to the Whole Army; the Jews being all withdrawn to the Second Wall. It was now the Seventh of the Month Artemiſius, when the Romans made themſelves Maſters of the Firſt Wall: the Greater Part of it they deſtroy'd; and ſo likewiſe the North-Quarter of the Town, which Ceſtius had ravaged before.

The Ram, or that which they call the Nicon, made the Firſt Breach.

The Jews quit the Firſt Wall, and withdraw to the Second.

Titus being now removed to a Place they call'd the Aſſyrians Camp, poſſeſſed himſelf of all betwixt That and the Valley of Cedron; ſomewhat more then a Bow-ſhot from the Second Wall: reſolving from thence to begin his Attacque; which he went in hand with immediately. The Jews poſted themſelves Orderly upon the Wall, and made a Gallant Reſiſtance. John and his Companions commanded in the Fortreſs Antonia, and the North-ſide of the Temple from the Sepulchre of Alexander. Simon and his Party maintain'd the Paſſage from the Monument of John the High-Prieſt to the Gate by which Water is convey'd to the Tower of Hippicos. The Jews made ſeveral deſperate Sallies, and came many times to a cloſe Fight with the Romans, hand to hand; but the Roman Diſcipline was too hard for the Unskilful Temerity of the Jews, and beat them back with Loſs: only upon the Walls they had the Better of them. The Romans had both Fortune and Conduct on their ſide; but the Jews ſupported themſelves by a kind of Deſpairing Roughneſs, and by a Natural Hardneſs againſt either Fatigue or Danger. And it is further to be conſider'd that the Jews fight for Life and Safety; the Romans, for Victory and Honour: and they were Neither of them to be tir'd-out; for Approaches, Aſſaults, Sallies, Forlorns, and Combats of all ſorts, were their Daily Exerciſes. They began with the Peep of Day, and ſo continu'd till Night parted them: when Both ſides were kept waking; the One for fear of their Walls; the Other for fear of their Camp; all Night in Arms, and the next Morning by Day-light ready for a Battle. The Jews valu'd themſelves

They make ſeveral Bold Sallies.

The Roman Diſcipline too hard for the Brutal Temerity of the Jews.

The Jews are Proof againſt all Manner of Fatigues or Dangers.

ſelves ſo much upon the Contempt of Death, and Hazzards, that they made an Emulation of it who ſhould Dare moſt; as the only way to ingratiate themſelves with their Superiours. Such was the Fear and Reverence they had for Simon, that All and Every Man that he had about him would have dy'd at his Feet, if he had but ſaid the Word; nay, and have been their Own Executioners too. Now for the Romans, they were ſo wonted to Victory that they did not know what it was to be Overcome. So that they needed no Other Encouragement to do bravely, then Experience and Succeſs: beſide, that War was Familiar and Habitual to them, by the Continual Exerciſe of Arms in the Service of a Glorious Empire; which with the Preſence and Aſſiſtance of a Martial Prince, over and above all the reſt, could not but inſpire them with a more then Ordinary Courage. What could be more Infamous then Cowardice, with a Martial Emperor for a Witneſs of it? Or what more Charming on the Other ſide, then the Honour and Reward that naturally follows Great Actions, in the Bounty and Eſteem of Cæſar? This Ardour and Ambition of Men's ſignalizing themſelves, tranſported ſeveral Heroical Spirits, 'tis true, into the Attempt of Things Extravagant, and beyond their Force.

A Glorious Action of Longinus.

There was at This time a ſtrong Body of the Jews drawn up before the Walls, and they were come already within diſtance of Exchanging Blows and Launces with the Romans. In This Inſtant of time, One of the Roman Horſe-men, (Longinus by Name) Spurr'd into the Middle of the Enemy's Army; where he kill'd Two of the Beſt Men they had: one of them he ſtruck through the Jaws with his Launce, and he ran the Other thorough the Body afterward with the ſame Weapon; coming-off to his Party at laſt without a Wound. He made himſelf Famous by This Action, and provoked Others to a Generous Emulation of following his Example. The Jews all this while were ſo Intent upon Doing Miſchief, that they never heeded what they ſuffer'd: and reckon'd upon Death as Nothing, if they had but One Life in Exchange for Another. But Titus had an Eye upon the Saving of his Men as well as the Gaining of a Victory, and look'd upon the Heats of an Inconſiderate Raſhneſs, but as Another ſort of Deſperation: neither would he allow any Exploit for True Valour, that was not govern'd by Caution and Prudence, and with the Leaſt Danger to Our Selves and the Moſt to Our Enemies.

Caſtor and Ten more with him lay cloſe behind the Battlements.

A Bold, a Crafty, and a Treacherous Jew.

THE Ram being now pointed againſt the Middle of the Tower on the North-ſide of the City; Titus pour'd-in ſuch Showers of Arrows upon the Defendants, that they all quitted their Poſts: only One ſly Crafty Jew, whoſe Name was Caſtor, and Ten of his People with him, lay skulking behind the Battlements. But when they had lay'n ſtill a-while, they felt a Shock that made the Tower ſtagger under them. Upon This, they got up; and Caſtor in the Language, Poſture, and Tone of a Supplicant, addreſs'd himſelf to Titus for Quarter, and begg'd his Pardon. Titus was ſo good-natur'd as to phancy the Jews had now enough of the War, and ſo put a Stop both to the Battery and the Archers; telling Caſtor at the ſame time, That if he had any Thing to ſay, he was ready to hear him. Caſtor made anſwer, That there Nothing he deſir'd ſo much as a Treaty. With all my Heart, ſays Titus; and if all your Companions be of the ſame Mind, I am ready to grant you your Pardon. Upon This Offer, Five of the Ten pretended to joyn with Caſtor: the Other Five cry'd out, that ſo long as they might die Free, they would never live Slaves. During This Diſpute, there was nothing further of Hoſtility. But Caſtor in the mean time ſends privately to Simon; to make the beſt of his time, and to conſider what was to be done; and leave it to Him to hold the Roman General in hand a while, under the Pretext of adviſing his Companions to a Peace. Caſtor did his Part ſo to the Life, that there were Swords drawn upon it; Blows given, and Men ſeemingly kill'd: but the Whole Story was a Cheat.

Titus Accepts of the Motion.

Titus and Thoſe about him were all amazed at the Inflexible Obſtinacy and Boldneſs of the Jews; and not without a Compaſſion for their Miſery: but being upon the Lower Ground, they could not ſee ſo diſtinctly what was done above. While This paſs'd, Caſtor was wounded with an Arrow near his Noſtrils; who preſently drawing it out, held it up to Titus, as an Appeal to him for Juſtice. This Prince reſented the Injury to ſuch a Degree, that he bad Joſeph (ſtanding next him) go to

Caſtor

Caſtor from Him, and give him all Aſſurances, in his Name, of Amity and Fair Quarter. Joſeph begg'd his Excuſe, and not only declin'd going upon That Errand Himſelf; but diſſuaded his Friends alſo that would have gone: telling them, that This Pretended Submiſſion was a Treachery all over. But Æneas however (One of the Deſerters to the Romans) would needs be venturing for all This; eſpecially upon Caſtor's Invitation; who bad him bring ſomewhat along with him to put a Sum of Money in, that he intended to preſent him. Æneas was forward enough to go upon Theſe Terms; and had no ſooner put himſelf in a Poſture to receive the Preſent, but Caſtor dropt a Great Stone down from the Wall, which Æneas had much ado to avoid; but it wounded the Man that ſtood next him. This Treachery gave Titus to underſtand the Danger of Unſeaſonable Good Nature; and that a ſteady Rigour is the Beſt Defence againſt Fair Words and Plauſible Pretenſions. So that to revenge Himſelf upon Caſtor and his Companions for the Affront they had put upon him, he betook himſelf to his Batteries again with Greater Violence then before. When Caſtor and his People found the Tower tottering, and juſt ready to ſink under them, they put fire to it; and ſo made their Eſcapes into a Vault thorough the very Flames. This Exploit gave them a Mighty Reputation among the Romans for Men of Reſolution and Courage; upon an Opinion that in This Action they were no Other then Devotees.

Caſtor makes his Eſcape thorough the very Flames.

Titus made himſelf Maſter of This Part of the Wall within Five Days after the Taking of the Firſt: and now finding the Way Open to the Second Wall, he drove out the Jews before him; and with a Thouſand Choice-Men enter'd the Town, among the Clothiers, Braſiers, Sales-Men, and all the Croſs Narrow Paſſages up to the Wall. Now if Titus had immediately broken down the Greater Part of This Wall, as by the Laws of War he might have done; the Victory would have coſt him little or nothing: but conſidering the Miſerable Neceſſities of the Jews on the One Hand, if they ſtood it out; and the Security of their Retreat on the Other hand, if they had a Mind to be gone; Titus relented yet once again, in Confidence that they would better bethink themſelves; and never imagining that they could be ſuch Ungrateful Monſters as to betray a Man that had taken ſo much Care for their Preſervation.

Miſtaken Mercy is Cruelty.

Titus a Prince of Tenderneſs and Humanity. The Spight and Malice of the Factions. A Sharp Fight; and the Jews get the Better of it. Titus Recovers the Day. The Romans get the Second Wall, and loſe it again. The Famine a Greater Calamity then the War. The Second Wall holds out Three Days; and Titus Maſters it upon the Fourth.

TITUS being now Enter'd the Town, would not ſuffer ſo much as One Priſoner to be Kill'd, or One Houſe to be Burnt: and he was ſo Fair to the Faction Themſelves too; that if they had a Mind to fight-it-out, he left them at liberty ſo to do; provided only that they ſhould not Force and Oppreſs the People. He promis'd the Inhabitants alſo at the ſame time, to maintain them in their Lawful Poſſeſſions, and to give them back again what had been taken from them. Theſe Propoſals were generally acceptable; ſome deſiring the City might be ſpar'd for their Own ſakes; Others, that the Temple might be ſpar'd for the City's. But This Humanity and Tenderneſs was all imputed by the Ruffian-part of the Faction, to the want of Courage in the General: for Titus, they ſaid, had only offer'd theſe Conditions, becauſe he deſpair'd of going thorough with his Work: The Faction threatning Death at the ſame time to any Man that ſhould but Open his Mouth, for a Peace or a Treaty. The Romans were no ſooner got into the Town, but the Jews annoy'd them all manner of Ways; by blocking-up the Narrow Paſſes; galling them from the Houſes, and forcing the Guards by Sallies from the Walls to quit their Towers and retire to the Camp. Never ſuch a Confuſion and Outcry as betwixt the Soldiers within the Town, in the Middle of their Enemies, and Thoſe without the Town for fear of their Companions within. The Jews being both more in Number, and better Acquainted with the By-ways and Secret Paſſages then the Romans; they were too hard for them upon all Encounters: and the Breaches not being wide enough to March-out many a-Breaſt, they were ſo put to it in the Croud, that, if Titus had not come-in juſt as he did; ſcarce a Man of them had got-off. But upon ſetting a Body of Archers at the End of every Street; and Titus poſting himſelf ſtill where there was moſt Danger, with Domitius Sabinus for his Second (a Brave Man upon the the Main, and One that did Wonders in That Action) they held the Jews in play with their Darts and Launces, till they brought-off their Men under the Cover of That Diverſion. Thus were the Romans, after the Gaining of the Second Wall, beaten-out again.

The Romaus gain the Second Wall, and loſe it again.

The Reſolute Part of the Citizens had the Vanity to flatter themſelves upon This Succeſs, into an Opinion, either that the Romans would never dare to look them in the Face again; or if ever it ſhould come to a Battle, that They Themſelves were Invincible. Now if Theſe Wicked Men had not been Judicially infatuated, they would have Conſider'd that the Romans which they had already Defeated, were not a Handful, to the vaſt Numbers they were yet further to Encounter: to ſay Nothing of the Famine that ſtill gain'd more and more upon them Every Day. For the Publique Ruine ſerv'd hitherto only for the Nouriſhment of Theſe People, and the Bloud of the Citizens for their Drink. Good Men, in fine, fell into Great Neceſſities; and not a Few dy'd, even of Famine it ſelf: but the Loſs of Theſe People was ſome ſort of Conſolation to the Faction, and they only wiſh'd well to Thoſe that would have a War with the Romans. As to the reſt, they look'd upon them only as an Uſeleſs Unprofitable Burden to the Publique; and This was the Kindneſs they had One for Another.

A Famine worſe then the War.

The Romans made another Attempt to recover the Wall again, which they had Gotten, and Loſt; and for Three Days ſucceſſively, without Intermiſſion, they ply'd the Aſſault with One Attaque upon the Neck of Another, and were as Valiantly repuls'd. But on the Fourth Day, Titus gave ſo Furious a Charge, that they were not able to ſtand it any longer: and, upon This Puſh, he got Poſſeſſion of the Wall; demoliſhed the Northern Part of it, and immediately placed Garriſons in all the Towers to the Southward.

The Second Wall ſtands it out Three Days, and Titus carries it the Fourth.

TITUS's Heart was now ſet upon Storming the Third Wall; but not looking upon it as a Work of Time, or Difficulty, he bethought himſelf of trying what might be done by Gentler Methods towards the bringing of them to their Duty and their Wits again; in Hope that betwixt Force and Famine, they might be prevailed upon to hearken to Better Councels: for their Booty and Proviſion was well nigh ſpent, on the One Hand; and Titus in as much Eaſe and Plenty as his Heart could wiſh, on the Other: inſomuch that, upon a Day of General Muſter, Titus order'd his Troops to be drawn-up and paid in ſight of the Enemy; the Foot advancing with their Swords drawn; and the Led-Horſes ſo glorioufly Capparifon'd, that the whole Field ſparkled with Gold and Silver. Nothing, in fine, could have been a more Agreeable Charming ſight to the Romans, or a more Terrible One to the Jews; who were gotten in Swarms together upon the Old Wall, on the North-ſide of the Town: beſide, that the Houſes were all Crouded, and the whole City Cover'd with People, gazing at the Bravery of This Pomp: which was ſuch, in ſhort, that it ſtruck a Damp into the very Boldeſt of the Jews; and would in all Probability have brought them over to the Romans, if they had not been Conſcious to Themſelves of Provocations and Affronts never to be forgiven; beſide, that it was Certain Death, on the other Hand, to give over the Diſpute. So that they rather choſe to die like Men of Honour by the Chance of War, then tamely by a Butchery. But the Fates had ſo order'd it that the Innocent were to Fall with the Guilty, and the City it ſelf with the Faction.

Titus ſpends Four Days in Victualling his Camp; and on the Fifth Prepares for Action.

When Titus, after This, had paſs'd away Four Days in Victualling his Camp, without any Act of Hoſtility, he divided his Army upon the Fifth Day into Two Bodies; and finding no Diſpoſition in the Jews to a Peace, he fell to caſting-up of Works againſt the Fortreſs Antonia, near John's Monument, in Hope of gaining the Upper-Town from That Quarter, and Then making himſelf Maſter of the Temple from Antonia: for without taking the Fort, the City was not to be Maintain'd. Againſt each of Theſe Two Places, he advanced Two Attaques, and poſted a Legion at every Mount,

Mount to Cover the Workmen. They that wrought next the Monument, were gall'd by the Jews, and by Simon's People; and the Other againſt Antonia were yet Harder put to't by John's Party, and his Bands of Zelotes; who had both the Higher Ground, and the Advantage of their Machines, an Engine which by daily Uſe and Practice they were now come perfectly to Underſtand. They had Three hundred Croſs-Bows, and Forty Slings for Stones, which very much annoy'd the Romans, and put a Check to the Progreſs of their Deſign.

Titus did ſo far preſume upon his Fortune, that he reckon'd the Town as good as his Own beforehand; but ſtill however as he ply'd the Siege on the One had, he did not forget to make Tryal of Perſuaſion and Advice, as well as Force, to bring the Jews to Reaſon on the Other. And conſidering that Words in many Caſes do more then Arms, he made it Firſt his Own Requeſt to the Jews to be Kind to Themſelves, only by putting a Place into his Hands that he could force at Pleaſure; and then left the reſt to Joſeph, upon an Opinion that the Humanity of ſuch an Office from the Lips of their Own Country-man, and in their own Language, might probably find Better Succeſs. Joſeph in purſuance of Titus's Commiſſion and Appointment, took a Walk about the Town; and at laſt making a Stand upon a Riſing-Ground, within Hearing of the Enemy, and out of Reach of their Shot, he deliver'd himſelf to them in Words to This Effect.

He Trys Perſuaſion and Advice, as well as Force.

I am now to beſeech you, my Dear Friends, (ſays Joſeph) as you love your Lives and Liberties, your City, your Temple, and your Country, let your Tenderneſs appear upon This Occaſion, and learn to be Merciful to your ſelves from your very Enemies, and Strangers. The Romans, you ſee, have ſo Great a Veneration for Holy Things, that they make a Conſcience of laying Violent Hands upon any Thing that is Sacred, and without pretending to any Part, or Intereſt in the Communion: whereas inſtead of Defending the Religion you were brought-up in, you are Engaged here in a Direct Conſpiracy to Suppreſs it. Do you not ſee that your Strengths are all beaten down already; your Weakneſſes Expoſed, and your Walls Defenceleſs; and that in This Condition it is morally Impoſſible for you to hold-out any longer againſt ſo Formidable a Power? Neither is it a New Thing (in caſe of the Worſt) for the Jews to be Subject to the Romans. It is a Glorious Cauſe, 'tis True, when Liberty is the Queſtion; provided it be Early enough, and before That Liberty is either Forfeited or Loſt; but for People to talk of ſhaking-off the Yoke, after they have once ſubmitted to it, and continu'd in That Obedience till they became Slaves by Preſcription: this is not the way to Live Free, but rather to Die with Infamy. It would be a Scandalous Bondage indeed, to ſerve a Maſter that a Man of Honour would be aſham'd to own; but it is Another Caſe to be Subject to a People that have the whole World at their Feet. As where's That Spot in the Univerſe, that has ſcap'd the Dominion of the Romans; ſaving only where Extreme Heats, or Colds, have render'd the Place Intolerable, and Uſeleſs. Fortune is effectually gone over to them; and the Great Diſpoſer of Empires Himſelf hath in his Providence at preſent made Italy the Seat of the Univerſal Monarch. Beſide, that it is according to the Sovereign Law of Nature, that governs in Beaſts, as well as in Men, to give way to the Stronger, and to ſubmit to the Longer Sword. This was it that made your Anceſtors, though in Power and Politiques, much your Superiours, to pay an Allegiance to the Romans: which they would never have done, if they had not been thoroughly convinc'd that it was GOD's Will to have it ſo. But to what End is it for you now to diſpute a Point any longer, that's as good as Loſt already? For if the Walls were yet Entire, and the Siege rais'd, Famine Alone would do the Work. It has begun with the Multitude; and the Soldiers Turn will be Next; and Every Day ſtill worſe then Other: for the Calamity is Inſuperable, and there is no Fence againſt Hunger. Wherefore you ſhould do well to bethink your ſelves in Time, and to take Wholeſom Advice before it be too Late. The Romans are Naturally a Generous Enemy, and ready to forgive and forget All that's paſt; provided you do not carry-on the Affront to an Unpardonable Extremity. They are not a People to Sacrifice their Intereſt to their Revenge, and to Charge Themſelves with the Incumbrance of a Depopulated City, and a Deſolated Province; but rather for receiving you with Open Arms into their Friendſhip, But if ever you come to be Taken by Storm, you muſt expect to be put to the Sword every Man of you: Thoſe eſpecially that in Defiance of the Emperour's Grace and Mercy ſhall continue Obſtinate to the Laſt. And for your Third Wall, what have you to look for from it, but the Fate of the Other Two that are gone before? Or what if your Works were abſolutely Impregnable? The very want of Bread, as I told you, would do the Office of the Sword.

Joſeph Harangues the Jews.

A Pinching Famine in the City.

While Joſeph was thus reaſoning the Matter with them, they return'd him only Bitter and Contemptuous Reproaches from the Walls, for his Good-Will; and not without Darts and Stones to accompany their Revilings. So that when he ſaw they were not to be wrought upon, either by Admonition, or by Affliction, he betook himſelf to the Hiſtory of Former Times, for Precedents, and Arguments to his Preſent Purpoſe.

Ab

Ah Miſerable, and Unthankful Wretches that you are, ſays he, to forget your Beſt Friends, and to encounter the Romans with Carnal and Common Weapons, as if the Victories you have formerly obtained had been the Effect of your Own Wiſdom and Virtue! Can you ſay that God, the Great Creator of Heaven and Earth, ever fail'd of Protecting the Jews when they were Oppreſs'd? Will you never be Wiſer? Do but conſider whence you come; where you are, and what you are a doing; and how Glorious a Protectour it is that you provoke by Theſe Outrages. Why do you not call to mind the Divine Exploits of your Illuſtrious Anceſtors, and the Wonderful Deliverances that God hath wrought for them by the Sacredneſs of This Holy Place? It gives me a Horrour to think of expoſing the Hiſtory of God's Miraculous Diſpenſations to a People ſo Unworthy of the Bleſſing; but yet, upon This Occaſion, I ſhall diſpence with That Scruple, to ſhew you that the War you are now engag'd in, is not ſo much againſt the Romans, as againſt God Himſelf.

The Ægyptian Bondage.

The Plagues of Ægypt.

And ſo when the Aſſyrians forced away from us the Holy Ark, how did Palæſtin, Dagon, and the Whole Nation that was concern'd in't, rue the Seizure of it! Their Guts became Putrid and Rotten, and the Pain of the Gripes Intolerable: inſomuch that their Bowels, and their Excrements came away together. And what was the End of it, in the Concluſion, but the bringing of the Ark back again to us with the Sound of Muſical Inſtruments, and with the ſame Sacrilegious Hands that took it away, to expiate in ſome Degree for the Wickedneſs! This was the Work of God Himſelf in Favour of our Anceſtors, for caſting themſelves entirely upon his Providence, and Mercy, without having any Recourſe to Common Means.

The Aſſyrians taking the Ark.

And what became of Sennacherib the King of Aſſyria, and That Prodigious Army of His, when he ſat down before this Place with the Whole Strength of Aſia at his Heels! Was he cut-off by the Arm of Fleſh, or any Humane Power? No. But when the Hebrews were quietly at their Prayers, the Angel of God confounded in One Night, That Mighty Army: and the Aſſyrian found 185000 of his Men Dead upon the Place next Morning, and the reſt flying in a Fright from the Unarmed Hebrews that had no Thought of purſuing them.

Sennacherib's Mighty Army.

You know likewiſe that Our People were Seventy Years Captives in Babylon, without making any Attempt toward the Recovery of their Liberty, till God put it in the Heart of Cyrus to diſcharge them, and to diſmiſs them into their Own Country; where they began to Offer Sacrifices again to God, as their Only Deliverer and Preſerver. But to be ſhort, what Great Thing did our Forefathers ever bring to paſs, either with Arms, or without, but by God's Particular Direction and Aſſiſtance in the Execution of his Orders. If they ſtay'd at Home, they were Victorious without Fighting; it being God's Pleaſure that it ſhould be ſo: and when they fought in a Confidence of their Own Strength, they never ſucceeded. As for Inſtance; when the King of Babylon laid Siege to This City, our King Zedekiah gave him Battle contrary to the Advice of the Prophet Jeremy; and what was the Event of it but the Routing of his Army; the taking of Zedekiah Priſoner, and the Deſtruction both of City and Temple before his Face! Do but obſerve the Difference now betwixt the Moderation of That Prince, and People, and of Yours. The Prophet told them plainly, that they were fallen under God's Diſpleaſure for their Wickedneſs; and that, if they did not deliver- up the City, it ſhould be forced from them by Aſſault: and yet for all this foreboding, neither Prince, nor People, Offer'd him any Violence. To ſay nothing now of what paſſes within your Walls; (an Iniquity, in truth, not to be expreſs'd) I ſhall only take Notice how barbarouſly I my ſelf have been Treated by you both in Words and Actions; and what's my Crime, I beſeech you, but the Honeſt Liberty of telling you your Faults, and adviſing you for the Beſt? But you have not Patience for the very Story of your own Dayly Practices.

It was much the ſame Caſe too, when Antiochus, call'd Epiphanes, laid Siege to This City. Our Forefathers, having many ways incurr'd God's High Diſpleaſure, preſs'd the Enemy to a Battle, without waiting for his Divine Direction and Aſſiſtance: The Jews were totally defeated; the Town Taken and Pillag'd; and the Sanctuary, for Three Years and Six Months, wholly abandon'd. In few Words, what was it but the Stubborn Croſſneſs of our own People that firſt irritated the Romans againſt the Jews? Whence are we to date our Slavery, but from our Own Seditious Countrymen; when the Two Factions of Ariſtobulus and Hyrcanus, in an Ambitious Heat of Competition, brought Pompey into the City; and made the Jews, that were Unworthy of Liberty, Slaves to the Romans? When they had held it out Three Months, they render'd the Place, though in a much Better Condition to defend it then you are, and infinitely ſhort of what you are to account for to the Laws and Religion of our Country. We all know what was the End of Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus; in whoſe Reign, the Jews were puniſh'd with Another Judicial Captivity for the Sins of the People. And did not (a) Herod likewiſe beſiege Jeruſalem with the Aſſiſtance of (b) Socius a Roman General, and in the Head of a Roman Army? After Six Months the Town was reduc'd, and rifled by the Enemy, as the Juſt Judgment upon the Party for their Iniquities. The Caſe of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Here is enough ſaid to ſhew that this way of Arms, and Sieges, hath been ever Fatal to our Brethren; and that the End of ſuch a War would be Certain Ruin. And therefore it ſeems reaſonable to me, that Thoſe that are in the Poſſeſſion of This Holy Place, ſhould entirely remit themſelves to the Conduct of God's Providence; who will never be wanting to Them that ſerve Him, and keep his Commandments. But you for your Parts lead your Lives in a Direct Oppoſition to His Holy Will, in leaving Undone what you are Commanded to Do, and in Doing what you are Forbidden. How much have You more to anſwer for, then Thoſe that you have ſeen taken-off by a Vindictive Juſtice in the Career of their Wickedneſs! As for the Secret Sins of Theft, Fraud, Treachery, and Adultery; you look upon as Trifles, and not worth the Speaking of. But you Value your ſelves upon Oppreſſion, Murder, and other Sins of the Firſt Magnitude, that were hardly ever heard of before. Nay, and you have made the Holy Temple it ſelf the Scene of your Wickedneſs; a Place ſo Sacred, that the Romans Themſelves have a Veneration for it, notwithſtanding the Inconſiſtences of their Religion: And yet This Place, that the very Romans have ſo great a Reverence for, is Polluted and Blaſphem'd by Thoſe that have been train'd up to the Temple-Worſhip. With what Face now can You pretend to expect Aſſiſtance from a Power that you have ſo Impiouſly Provok'd! But taking it for granted that you are Juſt, Humble and Righteous; and your Hands as Clean, as our King's were when he Stretch'd them out to implore Succour from Heaven againſt the Aſſyrian, and when the Return of his Prayer was, the next Night, the Utter Ruine of the Enemy's Army. Now if you will have it that the Romans behave themſelves as the Aſſyrians did, you may expect that God will deal with Them after the like manner. But This is quite Another Caſe, for the Aſſyrian Compounded for a Sum of Money to ſave the City; and then brake his Oath, and ſet Fire to the Temple: whereas the Romans only demand a Yearly Tribute; and no more neither then what had been paid them formerly Time out of Mind. Let This be made good to them, and the Temple and City have nothing to fear: But you ſhall enjoy your Families, your Liberties, and your Eſtates; with the Free Exerciſe of your Religion, and under the Regulation of your Own Laws. You muſt be Mad to imagine that God will treat Tyrants and Murderers, and Men of Moderation and Juſtice, all alike; eſpecially when Puniſhment and Vengeance are but the Work of a Moment to the Almighty.

The Aſſyrians, you ſee, were deſtroy'd the firſt Night they came before the Town; and if it had been the Will of God to ſet the One Free, and to Chaſtize the Other, he would have pour'd down his Wrath upon the Romans, as he did upon the Aſſyrians: either when Pompey firſt forced Jeruſalem; or Socius, after Him; or when Veſpaſian haraſs'd Galilee; or now at laſt, upon the Attaque of Titus. But neither Pompey, nor Socius, met with any Signal Oppoſition from Heaven; and they both ſucceeded in their Enterprizes upon the Place. As for Veſpaſian, he advanc'd himſelf to the Empire upon the Credit of the War he made upon Us. And what do you think of (almoſt) a Miracle, Wrought in favour of Titus? Siloa, you know, and other Fountains without the City were drawn ſo low before Titus came hither, that Water was hardly to be got for Mony; but ſince his Arrival here, the Springs are grown ſo Quick again, that there is Sufficient for the Romans, to All Manner of Purpoſes: and not only for Themſelves, and their Cattle; but for the Gardens too. The ſame Thing happen'd at the Time when the King of Babylon, before-mentioned, March'd-up to Jeruſalem with his Army; took the Town and City, and laid them Both in Aſhes: Now This Prodigy was the Forerunner of That Ruine and Conflagration. Not that I take the Wickedneſs of Thoſe Days to have been Comparable to That of the Preſent Age: but it looks as if God had abandon'd his Own Houſe and People in favour of the Enemy. Make it the Caſe now of the Maſter of the Houſe, and a Vicious and Debauch'd Family. If he be a Virtuous Man, he'll ſhift his Quarter, and never endure to be under the Roof with That ſort of People. How can you imagine then, that God will Countenance your Abominations? An All-ſeeing God, that ſearches the Privacies of your Hearts, and reads your Thoughts in their very Conception. But alaſs! You have no Privacies at all, no Reſerves; but make your very Enemies the Confidents of all you do. You live in a kind of Competition who ſhall be Lewdeſt, and value your ſelves upon an Oſtentation of your Wickedneſs.

God is Merciful to the Penitent.

But God is not inexorable to Thoſe that Confeſs their Miſdoings, and Truly Repent; which is the Courſe that you muſt take, if ever you hope for Mercy. Wherefore caſt away your Arms; let your Hearts bleed for the Judgments you have brought upon your Country. Do but look well about you, and conſider the Sweetneſs of the Place; the Glory of the City, and the Majeſty of the Temple that you are now about to betray: with the Ineſtimable Maſs of Treaſure that is there depoſited, in Donatives, and Oblations from All Quarters. Can any Man have the Heart now to think of Expoſing Theſe Magnificent Curioſities to Fire and Pillage; or of ſeeing Thoſe Excellencies deſtroy'd, which of all Things under the Sun are Beſt worth the Preſerving? If you were not Harder, and more Inſenſible then Stones, This Reflexion would move you; or, if nothing elſe will work upon you, bethink your ſelves of your Parents, your Wives, your Children, and your Families, that are at this Inſtant upon the Brink of Periſhing, either by Famine, or by the Sword. It will be ſaid perhaps, becauſe I have a Wife of my Own, a Mother and a Family, (of ſome Credit formerly) concern'd in the Common Hazzard, that it is for Their Sakes, and my Own Intereſt, that I give This Councel. But if either the Sacrificing of Their Lives, or Mine, or Both, may conduce to Your Safety; I am ready to deliver them-up All, upon Condition that You will be Wiſer, and Honeſter, when We are gone.

Joſeph's Generous Reſignation for the Good of his Country.

This Diſcourſe of Joſeph's drew Tears from his Own Eyes; but the Factions were not One jot ſoften'd with it: neither did They think it ſafe to cloſe with the Romans, even if they had had a Mind to't. But, on the Contrary, the Common Sort were ſtagger'd at it, and made it their Buſ'neſs too, how to ſave themſelves by Flight. To this End, they ſold what they had that was Valuable, though at Eaſy Rates, and ſwallow'd the Gold for fear of being Robb'd upon the Way: By which Means they ſupply'd themſelves with Neceſſaries when they got over to the Romans. Titus, in the mean time, leaving the Stragglers at Liberty to go whither they would; and This Diſcharge was ſtill a Greater Encouragement to their Eſcape; for they got Clear of the City-Broils without being Slaves to the Romans. But John and Simon, and their Companions, clapt a Strict Guard upon the Paſſes, and took as much Care to keep the Citizens from going-out, as the Romans from coming-in: So that the Leaſt Suſpicion, or Pretence of a Suſpicion, was enough to take away any Man's Life that They thought fit to Suſpect. And it was all one to the Rich what they did: for he that had any thing to loſe, was ſure to fall under a Jealouſy; and That Jealouſy was Death.

The Rage of the Faction, and the Pinch of the Famine encreaſed daily; and when there was no Corn any longer in Sight, they brake-up Houſes for't. If they found any upon the Search, the Owners were ſeverely handled for denying it; or, if None, they were put to the Torture to diſcover their Stores. Nay, they drew Inferences of Guilt from the very Bodies of the Miſerable; and to be Hail and Sound, was made an Argument of Private Stores and Plenty. The Conſumptive were diſpatch'd out of hand; though no need, one would think, of putting Them to a Violent Death, that were ready to Starve for want of Bread. There were ſeveral of the Better Sort that ſold all they had in the World for a Buſhel of Wheat; and Others of the Poorer, for the ſame Proportion of Barley: And then ſhutting-up themſelves, with their Purchaſe in Secret Hiding-Holes; ſome fell to work upon the Corn without Grinding, and ſome again ſtay'd the Baking of it; according as they were more or leſs preſs'd by Hunger or Danger. There was no ſuch Thing as the Ceremony of Covering, or Marſhalling a Table; but Happy was He that could Snatch a Bit from the Coals betwixt Raw and Roaſted. Never ſo Miſerable a Calamity, or ſo Lamentable and Horrid a Spectacle; where the Strongeſt ſtill far'd Beſt, and the Weaker had nothing more to do then to bemoan their

Miſe-

Misfortunes: Starving being certainly of all Deaths the moſt deplorable, as it takes away all Senſe of (a) Shame, Tenderneſs and Reſpect: Wives forc'd away the Meat out of the very Mouths of their Husbands; Children did the like by their Parents; and what was yet more Barbarous, Mothers, by their Infants; taking away from them, as they lay languiſhing in their Arms, the very Laſt Support of Life: and This could not be done ſo Privately neither, but ſome Body or Other was ſtill at hand to take away That from Them again, which they had taken from Others. Wherever they ſaw a Houſe Shut-up, they concluded there was Eating in That Houſe; and preſently forcing the Doors, they tore the Meat ready Chew'd out of the very Throats of the People, juſt as they were about to ſwallow it, though to the Hazzard of Choaking them. They had no Mercy either for Age, or Sex; but beat the Old Men that offer'd to defend what Proviſion they had got, and dragg'd the Women by the Hair for endeavouring either to keep, or to conceal any thing. Neither did Sucking Children ſcape any better; but they were torn away from the Breaſt, and daſh'd againſt the Ground: ſo that Infancy, and Grey Hairs had the ſame Quarter. There could hardly be a more Unpardonable Affront, when any of Theſe Freebooters were abroad upon Adventure, then for Him that was purſu'd to Outrun his Purſuer, and to eat his Own Bread before the Other could come-up. They ſpar'd for no manner of Cruelty, provided they might but get ſomething to ſtay their Stomachs: as the putting of People to Exquiſite Pains in their moſt Senſible Parts; thruſting-up Pointed Sticks into their Bodies, and Other ſuch like Torments not to be mentioned without Horror: and All This for the Diſcovery of a Poor Loaf of Bread perhaps, or a Handful of Flour that they had conceal'd. And their Tormentors were not Hungry neither; for the Tyranny would have been more Pardonable, if they could have pleaded Neceſſity in their Excuſe. But This was a Freak purely of Inhumanity, when they were Victualling themſelves with Six Days Proviſion beforehand. Some Poor Wretches, that had given the Roman Guards the Slip, and crept out of the Town by Night for Herbs and Sallad, had the Ill hap to fall into their Hands when they thought themſelves out of all Danger; where they were ſtript of all they had; and glad at laſt, after a Thouſand Importunities, and Prayers, only for Part of their Own again, for which they had run ſo Great a Hazzard to Compound for their Lives. This was the Treatment They receiv'd from the Common Soldiers; but Perſons of Quality were carry'd to the Uſurpers Themſelves: Some of them put to death for Treaſon, and a Deſign of Betraying the City to the Romans, upon the Teſtimony of Falſe Witneſſes; and This was ſtill One of the Articles, that they had a Mind to go over to the Enemy. Thoſe that Simon had pillag'd were carry'd to John, and John's Priſoners to Simon, as if they had been quaffing Healths one to another, and Sharing their Carcaſſes betwixt them. They were divided, in fine, who ſhould be Uppermoſt; but perfectly well agreed in the Methods of their Tyranny and Uſurpation. They went Halves in their Robberies, and He was reckon'd the Greater Knave of the Two that Cozen'd his Companion of any Part of his Moiety in the Booty; to which they were Both equally entitled.

It would be Endleſs to run thorough the Hiſtory of their Iniquities; but to Comprize All in a Little, I am verily perſuaded that there never was ſo Miſerable a City, or ſo Barbarous a People, upon the Face of the Earth: In fine, the better to palliate their Inhumanity to Strangers, they revil'd the very Nation of the Hebrews; and Own'd Themſelves (as in truth they were) for a Company of Slaves and Scoundrels, Vagabonds and Baſtards. In the Concluſion, they laid the City in Rubbiſh and Aſhes; nay, and the Burning of the Temple was effectually their Act too, both in the Haſtening of it, and by the Forcing of Titus, even againſt his Inclination, upon Thoſe Extremities. As the Upper Town was in a Flame, the Romans gave many Inſtances of a Generous Compaſſion; (as will be ſeen hereafter) but not ſo much as a Sigh, or a Tear to be heard of among the Jews. But of This further in its Proper Place, with Remarques upon the Whole Matter.

The Burning of the City was their Own Act.

The Miſerable Diſtreſs of the Jews.

Titus, all this while, ply'd his Works dayly; but not without Loſs of Men from the Walls. It was the Jews Practice to ſteal out in the Night, and look abroad for Proviſions; and not without ſome Soldiers among them, that could not get wherewithal in the City to anſwer their Neceſſities. Theſe People were moſt of them Poor, and durſt not Deſert for fear of having their Wives and their Childrens Throats cut that they left behind. Neither durſt they take their Families along with them for fear of Diſcovery. Titus being aware of theſe Difficulties, ordered out a Detachment of Horſe to way-lay the Jews in the Vallies. Hunger had made them Deſperate, and ſo out they went, and fell into the Enemies Ambuſhes. When they found themſelves hamper'd, they were then forc'd to fight upon Neceſſity, for fear of ſome Puniſhment worſe then Death it ſelf; beſide that it was now too late to think of begging Quarter. In ſhort, they were maſter'd; and after expoſing them to all manner of Tortures, they were Crucified in the Sight of the Beſieg'd.

Tortur'd and Crucify'd in the Sight of the Beſieged

Titus forced upon Severities in his own Defence.

Titus was not at all pleas'd with the Severity of this Rigour; but he did not find it ſafe, either to diſcharge ſo many Obſtinate Priſoners that he had now at Mercy, or to ſpare Men enough to look after them from the Service of the Army: beſide the Hope he had, that the Terror of ſuch an Example might move them to bethink themſelves, leſt it ſhould come to be their own Caſe. They were all Crucify'd; but in ſeveral Ways, and Poſtures: ſome, to expreſs their Rage; others, their Hatred; and ſome again, their Mockery and Contempt: But the Number of the Priſoners was ſo Great, that they wanted room for more Croſſes, and Croſſes for the Bodies. And ſo far was the Horror of this Execution from ſoftening the Faction, that, as they ordered the Matter, it wrought a clear contrary Effect by the Help of this Invention. The Friends and Relations of the Fugitives, and thoſe that had but the Leaſt Inclination to a Peace, were drag'd-out to the Walls to ſhew them what they were to truſt to that went over to the Romans; and bearing them down all the while, that the Men they ſaw in Chains were not Priſoners of War, but Deſerters that ſu'd for Mercy. This Device kept a great many from Filing-off, till the Truth came to be known; though ſome there were that immediately ſlipt away to the Enemy to avoid Starving, which they look'd upon as incomparably the more Miſerable Death of the Two.

Priſoners of War they pretend to be Deſerters that could get no Quarter.

Titus, upon this, cauſed ſeveral of his Priſoners Hands to be cut off, and ſo ſent them away to John and Simon, in ſuch a Plight, that they might neither look like Deſerters, nor be taken for ſuch: adviſing them at the ſame time to put an End to the War, without forcing him upon the Deſtruction of the City; for it was not yet too late, upon a Seaſonable Submiſſion, to preſerve their Lives, their Country, and their Temple entirely to themſelves. But Titus advanc'd his Works all this while; quick'ning, and encouraging the Workmen, being reſolved very ſuddenly to follow his Works with Effects, and to gain his Point by Force, which he could not compaſs by Reaſon and Perſuaſion.

The Obſtinate Malice and Reſolution of the Jews.

The Jews, in the mean time, caſting out a Thouſand Curſes from the Walls, againſt both Veſpaſian and Titus, declared one and all their Contempt of Death, and how much their Liberties were Dearer to them then their Lives: and that, provided they might plague the Romans, they car'd not what became either of themſelves or of their Country; which Titus told them, were in Danger to periſh. And as for their Temple, they look'd upon the World to be much the more Magnificent Structure of the Two; or however, they made no doubt but God would take care of his Own Houſe; and upon Him they depended for Protection, in diſpite of all their Threat'nings, which God would never ſuffer to take Place. This was the Subſtance of their Outrageous, and Unmannerly Reply.

Antiochus Epiphanes was by this Time come-up, and a Train of Armed Troups along with him; One Company, among the reſt, of Stout Young Fellows for his Guard, all about the ſame Age; accoutred, and train'd-up after the Macedonian Way; from whence they took the Name of Macedonians: not for their Birth, neither neither did the greater Part of them anſwer the Character of that People. Of all the Princes that were ever ſubjected to the Roman Empire, the King of Cammagena was undoubtedly the moſt Proſperous and Succeſsful, for the Former Part of his Life; but in his Latter Days his Fortune forſook him, and verify'd the Old Saying, That No Man is to be pronounc'd Happy before his Death. He had a Son of a Martial Enterprizing Spirit; of a Robuſt Body, and Bold to the degree of Raſhneſs. This Son of his was ſaying one Day that he wonder'd the Romans ſtood trifling before the Walls at that rate, and did not rather puſh it to an Attaque. Titus anſwer'd him with a Smile, that the Way was Open to any Man that had a mind to't. The Word was no ſooner out, but Antiochus led up his Macedonians to the Aſſault, and gave Proof both of his Valour and Conduct in the Menage of the Action: but his Followers however were almoſt All of them Kill'd, or Wounded; having made ſuch Brags beforehand what Wonders they would do, that they could not in Honour quit the Undertaking. This gave the Young Men to Underſtand that the Macedonian Courage would never do the Bus'neſs without Alexander's Fortune: ſo that they were forc'd to quit the Attempt, and bring-off the Remainder of their Men as well as they could.

The Romans Raiſe 4 Mighty Works in 17 Days.

It was upon the Twelfth of the Month Artemeſius, that the Romans began the Platforms formerly mention'd; and upon the Nine and Twentieth that they finiſh'd them, after Seventeen Days hard Labour; for there were Four of them in All, and they were Mighty Works. There was One toward Antonia, that was rais'd by the Fifth Legion over againſt the Middle of the (a) Struthian-Pool: there was Another caſt-up by the Twelfth Legion, within Twenty Cubits of the Former. The Tenth Legion, (which was more Conſiderable then the Other Two) threw-up Another Work to the North over againſt the (b) Pool call'd Amygdalon; and at Thirty Cubits diſtance from the laſt, was a Fourth Mount erected by the Fifteenth Legion, not far from the Monument of John the High-Prieſt.

Theſe Works were no ſooner up and perfected, but John cauſed a Mine to be wrought under That which look'd toward Antonia, and ſeveral Wooden Props to be ſet-up all along the Trench, to keep the Weight of the Earth above from falling; dawbing the Wood-work with a Bituminous Matter that would take Flame immediately. So that John had now no more to do, but to ſet Fire to the Pillars; which when the Props were gone, brought down the Whole Bullwark with a moſt Hideous Noiſe. There was no Fire to be ſeen at Firſt, but only a Smothering Duſt and Smoke; till the Flame at laſt brake thorough all Oppoſition, and ſhew'd it ſelf. This was ſo Aſtoniſhing a Surprize to the Romans, that it put them to their Wits End to receive ſuch a Baffle, when they made themſelves ſure of their Point. Neither was it to any Purpoſe to think of Quenching the Fire, when their Ramparts were gone.

The Jews ſet Fire to the Bullwark.

It was but Two Days after This that Simon and his People made an Attempt upon the Other Mounts; where the Romans had already planted their Rams, and began to Batter. There was One Jepthæus of Garſis a City of Gallilee; Megaſſarus a Domeſtique of Queen Mariamne's; and One of Adiabena, the Son of Nabatæus; who, from a Misfortune he had, was called Agiras; which ſignifies Lame: Theſe Three Men, with Torches in their Hands, flew directly to the Machines; and breaking through the Enemy's Troups, with no more Concern then if they had been among their Friends, ſet Fire to them; and in deſpite of all Oppoſition, with Darts and Arrows, they purſu'd their Deſign till their Engines were all in a Flame. Theſe were reputed Three of the Braveſt Men that appear'd in That War.

Simon Attempts the Other Mounts. A Glorious Action of Three Jews.

Upon the mounting of the Fire, the Romans diſpatch'd away a Detachment from the Camp to the Relief of their Companions; but the Jews, in the mean time, pour'd their Shot upon them from the Walls; and without any regard to their Own Lives or Perſons, fought it out hand to hand with Thoſe that were endeavouring to put a Stop to the Fire. The Romans did all they could to ſave their Rams; the Covers of them being Conſum'd already: and the Jews ventur'd into the very Flames to hinder them; and would not let go their Hold, though the Iron-work of them was Burning-Hot. The Fire paſs'd from thence to the Ramparts; and there was no Help for it. Upon This, the Romans finding themſelves encompaſs'd with Flames, and no Hope left them of ſaving the Works, withdrew into their Camp. The Jews had ſo many Enforcements out of the City, that the Encreaſe of their Number made them more and more Preſſing and Inconſiderate: inſomuch, that in the Heat of their Succeſs, they Advanced to the very Camp it ſelf, and attaqu'd the Guards. Now the Office of Theſe Guards, according to the Rule of the Roman Diſcipline, was to do

Duty

Death for a Roman to quit his Poſt.

Duty by Turns, and Relieve one another: and not a Man of them, upon Pain of Death without Mercy, to quit his Poſt, under any Colour whatſoever. Now Theſe People having This Charge before-hand, either to Fall like Men of Honour, or to ſuffer an Infamous Death, as Deſerters; they made a Generous Reſiſtance, and brought ſeveral of Thoſe back again, betwixt Neceſſity and Shame. that had abandon'd their Station; and, with their Engines, put a Stop to the Excurſions of the Jews from the City. They made their Sallies without any Guard of Defence for their Own Security; Fighting all they met, at a Venture, and caſting themſelves like Madmen upon the very Points of the Enemies Pikes, and falling-in Pell-Mell among them. The Jews, in fine, gain'd more upon the Romans by a Raſh Hardineſs, then by Pure Courage: and the Romans, on the Other Hand, gave way rather to the Outrageous Boldneſs of the Jews, then for the Apprehenſion of any Miſchief they could do them.

Titus, at his Return from Antonia, where he had been to find-out a Commodious Ground for advancing his Attaques, gave the Soldiers a ſevere Rebuke for ſuffering themſelves after the Gaining of the Enemy's Works, to be diſtreſs'd in their Own, and in a Manner beſieg'd by Thoſe that were no Better then Priſoners Themſelves.

A Sharp Fight upon the Diſmounting of the Engines.

Titus, upon This, with ſome of his Choice-Troups, ſurrounded the Jews, and charged them in the Flank; while They, on the Other ſide, maintain'd their Ground with a Wonderful Reſolution. Upon the Shocking of the Two Bodies, it rais'd ſuch a Duſt and Clamour, that there was nothing diſtinctly to be either ſeen or Heard; and neither their Friend nor Foe to be known aſunder: neither were the Jews thus Obſtinate, out of any Confidence, in their Own Strength; but out of Deſpair of Safety: while the Romans were ſo Enrag'd, on the Other ſide, betwixt the Nicety of Military Honour, and the Paſſion they had for the Perſon of the Emperour, which was then in Danger, that if the Jews had not ſlipt away into the Town juſt as they did, they had undoubtedly been all cut to pieces: but ſtill the Loſs of their Bullwarks went to the Heart of the Romans; and to find it the Work but of One Hour to deſtroy, what had been ſo long a-raiſing. This Diſappointment, together with the diſmounting of their Engines, put them out of all Hope of ever gaining the Place.

Titus in Deſpair of gaining his Point.

CHAP. XIII.

Titus Conſults a Councel of Officers. Some for puſhing it to a Battle; Some for making Good the Ramparts; Others for Intercepting Proviſions. Titus Orders the running up of a Wall: the Courſe and Compaſs of it: and This Wall finiſhed in Three Days.

Titus calls a Councel of War.

WHile Things were in This Poſture, Titus call'd a Council of his Great Officers to adviſe him what to do. Some Sharp Men among them were of Opinion for a General Aſſault, and falling-on with the Whole Army; for there had been nothing done as yet (they ſaid) but in Skirmiſhes, and Parties; and if it came once to a Main Battle, the Jews would never be able to ſtand the Dint of the very Darts and Arrows. The more Conſiderate Part were for Renewing and Repairing their Ramparts; Others for having no Works at all, but only Watching the Victuallers, and keeping the City from Proviſions: and ſo committing the reſt to the Famine, which would do the Buſ'neſs of the Sword without Striking a Blow. There is no beating of People out of their Reſolution that have a Mind to Die. Now Titus, 'tis true, did not think it Honourable to lie ſtill in the Head of a Formidable Army, altogether without Action; but he was not for fighting yet with a People ſo bent upon their Own Deſtruction. As for the Erecting of New Works, he found it Morally impracticable for want of Materials; and ſo, for the Watching of all Paſſengers, to ſecure the Avenues; for it was not a Thing to be done, in regard both of the Compaſs of the Town, and the Difficulties of the Places: or, if the High-ways were all blockt-up, the Jews would yet find-out other Private Conveyances in caſe of Neceſſity; and by the Advantage of knowing all the Secret Paſſages in That Neighbourhood. Now what if the Jews ſhould ſlip any Relief into the City by Stealth, it would but draw-out the Siege at length, and leſſen the Honour of the Victory by the Delay: Or, let it be granted now, that all This may be done; and the Reputation of the Romans, together with the Safety of the Army, may be provided for, Both in One: Diſpatch is yet to be preferr'd before Glory; but the ſure way to do the Thing at laſt, with Caution and Expedition, muſt be by running a Wall quite round the City. By This Means all Excurſions will be prevented; and the Jews either forc'd to deliver-up the Place in the Depth of their Deſpair, or weaken'd by the Pinch of their Neceſſities, into an Incapacity of defend-ng Themſelves: whereas otherwiſe, the Diſpute will be Endleſs. But This ſhall not hinder Me, ſays Titus, from giving Orders for the Repairing of the Works; eſpecially when the Weaker Part of Thoſe that are left, are already ſufficient to put a Stop to the Courſes of the Enemy. This may be look'd upon perhaps as a Project of Inſuperable difficulty; but if it had been Leſs, it would not have ſtood with the Dignity of the Undertaker: neither are Great Things to be brought about without Labour, but by the more Immediate Aſſiſtance of an Almighty Power.

Titus made an End of what he had to ſay, with an Order to his Officers to go in hand immediately with the Erecting of This Wall, and to Enter upon it with a Regular Diſtribution of the Whole Army into their Proper Stations. The Word was no ſooner given, but the Soldiery were all tranſported by a kind of Divine Impulſe into a Generous Æmulation of out-doing One Another: for after the Meaſuring of the Ground, and the Dividing of the Legions, the ſame Spirit of Competition ran thorough the Whole Body. The Common Soldiers with their Sergeants; the Sergeants, the like with their Captains; the Captains, with their Tribunes; the Tribunes, with their Superiours, and all in Subordination to Titus; who was ſo Intent upon his Buſneſs, that he never miſs'd a Day of taking a Round of the Whole Work.

Titus Orders the Erecting of a Wall about the Town, and Diſpoſing the Whole Army into their Proper Stations.

Titus began This Wall at a Place call'd the Aſſyrians Camp, where he Himſelf had his Quarter. He carry'd it forward to the Lower-Cænopolis; and ſo by the Way of Cedron to Mount Olivet; which he enclos'd on the South as far as the Rock Periſtereon; together with a Neighbouring Hill that over-looks the Vale of Siloah. From thence he turn'd his Point a little to the Weſtward, and ſo on to the Vally of the Fountain. He took his way next, to the Sepulchre of Ananus the High-Prieſt; and ſo Encloſing the Mountain where Pompey had formerly Encampt, he return'd to the Northward, and paſs'd on to a Village call'd (a) Erebinthonicus; took in Herod's Sepulchre toward the Eaſt; and there join'd One End of the Wall to the Other where he began.

The Courſe of the Wall.

The Compaſs of this Wall was 39 Furlongs; 13 Forts built on the Out-ſide of it; and every Fort Ten Furlongs about. But the moſt Incredible Part of the Story was the Finiſhing of an Encloſure in Three Days, which might well have taken as many Months. Upon the Perfecting of This Work, there were Guards poſted in all the Forts that did Duty every Night under their Arms. Titus went the Firſt Round Himſelf; Tiberius Alexander, the Second; and the Commanders of the Legions, the Third. The Soldiers, and the Watch ſlept by Turns; but Some or Other ſtill upon the Guard in the Caſtles, all Night.

CHAP. XIV.

The Miſerable Diſtreſſes of a Devouring Famine. The Romans make Oſtentation of their Plenty, to Enflame the Envy of the Jews. Four Ramparts Raiſed at Antonia Larger then the Former.

THE Shutting-up of the Jews in the Town, put them to the Uttermoſt Degree of Deſpair: for the Famine was now ſo Outrageous, that it ſwept away whole Families. The Houſes were ſtrew'd with the Carcaſſes of Women and Children; and the Narrow-Lanes, with the Bodies of Old Men that lay Dead there: Young Men walk'd the Streets like ſo many Ghoſts. There was no ſuch Thing as Burying the Dead: Some wanted Strength to do the Office; Others wanted Will, as being diſcouraged partly by the Great Number of them, and partly in regard they did not know but their Own Turn might be next. Some there were that Expir'd Themſelves in the very Act of Burying Others; and ſome again haſten'd away to their Grave before their Time, to make ſure of a Reſting-place while they were yet Living. And yet in the Depth of all This Miſery, there was not heard ſo much as One Groan, or Outcry; but all Other Paſſions were ſtifled in the Pain of a Tormenting Hunger. Thoſe that dy'd laſt, ſtood gazing with Dry Eyes, and Ghaſtly Looks, upon Thoſe that were out of their Pain before them. The City was all wrapt-up in a Profound Silence, and Heaps of Dead Bodies Pil'd together up and down in the Night. But the moſt Deplorable Part of the Story, was the Inſolence and Brutality of the Thieves; inſomuch, that the Famine it ſelf was nothing to't. They brake into Houſes, which at That time were no Better then Charnel-Houſes; ſtript the Dead to their very Skins, and then made themſelves Sport with their Nakedneſs; trying the Temper of their Swords upon the Bodies of the Poor People as they lay half Dead. If any Man call'd for a Hand or a Sword to diſpatch him out of the way, and deliver him from the Miſery of the Famine, he was repuls'd with an Inſenſible Cruelty, and Neglect. As they came to the Point of Death, they ſtill clos'd their Eyes toward the Temple; and it went even then to the Hearts of them to leave Theſe Wretched Miſcreants yet among the Living, that had ſo Lewdly Prophan'd That Holy Place. When they were now no longer able to endure the Putrid Corruption of the Dead Bodies, Order was given to have them all Interr'd at the Publique Charge: but for want of Room to diſpoſe of them, Theſe Impious Monſters caſt them down Headlong from the Walls into the Vallies; which was ſo Horrid a Spectacle, that Titus, upon taking the Round of the Place, finding the Ditches ſo peſter'd and annoy'd with Rotten Carcaſſes and Peſtilential Vapours, he ſtretch'd-out his Hands to Heaven in an Appeal to Almighty God, that it was againſt His Will to have it ſo. This was the State and Diſpoſition of the City at That Time.

The Romans make an Oſtentation of their Plenty, to Reproach the Jews in their Extream Neceſſities.

While the Faction was now ſo Coopt up within their Walls, that there was no ſtirring out of the Town; beſide the Double Mortification they endur'd, of Famine, and Deſpair; the Romans at the ſame time, paſs'd their Days Merrily, and at Eaſe, in an Abundance of all ſorts of Neceſſary Proviſions out of Syria, and the Neighbouring Provinces: inſomuch that ſeveral of the Romans, out of an Invidious Oſtentation of their Stores, came-up to the very Walls to irritate the Wants on the One ſide, with Expoſing the Plenty on the Other. But all wrought Nothing upon the Inſenſible Hearts of the Seditious; inſomuch that Titus, in pure Compaſſion to the Remainder of a Miſerable People, reſolv'd to go in hand with caſting-up New Works afreſh; and haſtening the Diſpatch as faſt as he could. The Only Difficulty was the Providing of wherewithal to carry it forward: for the Wood near the City was all cut-down already for the Former Works; ſo that they were now forc'd to fetch all their Timbers for a Second Supply, at Ninety Furlongs diſtance from the Place: and four were Ramparts erected at the Fortreſs Antonia larger then the Former. Titus loſt no time; and having the Faction now at Mercy, he gave them to Underſtand as much. But they went on ſtill without any Sign of Remorſe, and with as little Regard to their Own Bodies and Souls, as if they had been the Bodies and Souls of Other People: For the Dead they tore to pieces like Dogs; and choak'd-up the Sick, and Languiſhing, in Priſons.

WHEN Simon had firſt put Matthias to the Torture, he put him afterwards to Death; and This was the Thanks he had for getting him admitted into the City. This Matthias was the Son of Boethus, a Prieſt, in High Eſteem with the People, and No Man Generally better belov'd. The Jews were hardly us'd (it ſeems) by the Zelotes; and upon John's joining with them, Matthias mov'd the Calling-in of Simon to their Aſſiſtance; but without any Caution, or Conditions, or any Bargain beforehand whatſoever. Simon had no ſooner made himſelf Maſter of the Town, but he treated Matthias as one of the Greateſt Enemies he had, and imputed the Advice he gave for the Opening of the Ports, to Groſs Simplicity, and Overſight: ſo that, upon This, he was Arraign'd and Accus'd for holding Intelligence with the Romans; and a Sentence of Death paſs'd upon the Father, and his Three Sons, (the Fourth having made his Eſcape to the Romans) without ſo much as Hearing what he had to ſay for Himſelf. The Only Favour This Venerable Old Man had to deſire of Simon, in return for the Obligation of letting him into the Town, was, that He Himſelf might Die Firſt; but Simon refuſed That Grace, and commanded the Father to be laſt Executed; to keep him ſo much the longer in Pain. Matthias, in the Concluſion, was put to Death upon the Bodies of his Sons, and in the Sight of the Romans, according to Simon's Order to Ananus, the Son of Bamadus; the Moſt Hard-Hearted Creature that Simon had about him. Neither did he content himſelf barely to Execute the Deteſtable Sentence; but in a Frolique of Inſolence, and Deriſion, when he was juſt upon the Point of Striking the Stroke; You would fain have have gone over to the Romans, ſays he to Matthias; and let Them bring you off now if they can. But, in ſhort, to conſummate the Inhumanity, the Bodies were all refuſed Burial, by the Special Command of Simon Himſelf.

There was alſo Ananias a Prieſt, the Son of Masbalus, Nobly deſcended; and Ariſteus a Native of Ammaus, and Secretary to the Council; who, with Fifteen more of the Principals of the People, were all put to Death. The Father of Joſeph was alſo made a Priſoner, with a Proclamation upon it, that no Man ſhould preſume to come at him upon Pain of Treaſon. Nay, it was made Death alſo, without either Tryal, or Mercy, but ſo much as to Pity them.

Ananias put to Death: and Joſeph's Father made a Priſoner.

It fell out after This, that Judas, the Son of Judas, an Officer of Simon's, and a Commander of One of the Turrets, laying to Heart the Brutal Oppreſſion of a Miſerable People, and not forgetting to look to Himſelf in the Firſt Place, he took an Occaſion to diſcourſe Half a Score of the Truſtieſt Friends he had, upon That Subject. [How long are we, ſays he, to Crouch under the Burden of This Tyranny, or what Hope of Safety in the Service of ſo Falſe, and ſo Cruel a Maſter? We have Sword and Famine to Encounter, and the Enemy as good as within our Walls already; Simon, of all Men living the moſt Ungrateful. He lives in a Perpetual Fear of Puniſhment: and the Romans, on the Other hand, are moſt certainly Men of Faith and Honour. So that we have no more to do, but to deliver-up the Walls, and to preſerve Our Selves, and Our Country, Both in One. Neither has Simon any Cauſe of Complaint, only he ſuffers a little ſooner.]

Judas the Son of Judas in a Plot to Deſtroy Simon.

When the Ten Men were come to an Agreement, Judas betimes ſent the Remainder of his People ſeveral ways, for a Blind to his Deſign; and about the Third Hour of the Day, call'd-out to the Romans, from the Turret, and gave them to Underſtand the Reſolution they had taken: ſome gave no Heed to't; others, no Credit; and ſome again thought it not worth their while to Maſter a Place they might get without Danger. By This time, Titus had drawn ſome Troups up to the Wall; but Simon immediately Surpriz'd the Town: and killing the Guard, in the very View of the Romans, tumbled the Bodies down the Wall. While Joſeph was walking up and down there, and doing the Jews the Beſt Offices he could by Encouragement and Advice, it was his Fortune to be knock'd down with a Stone from the Battlements: whereupon the Jews made a Deſperate Sally, and had carry'd him off a Priſoner; if Titus, in That Inſtant, had not ſent a Party to his Reſcue. During This Skirmiſh, they got away Joſeph, before he was well come to himſelf again. The Faction took it to be as they wiſh'd it; and mightily Overjoy'd they were in the Belief that Joſeph was Slain. The Rumour paſs'd for Current through the City, and put the Inhabitants into a Diſmal Conſternation, for the Loſs of their Mediator, and Patron among the Romans. The Tidings of Joſeph's Death being brought to his Mother in Priſon, ſhe told her Guards that ſhe heard as much, and that ſhe ſhould never ſee him more. Upon This Occaſion, the Women condol'd with her; and ſhe her ſelf deploring her own Misfortune, that in bearing a Son who (ſhe hop'd) would have bury'd the Mother, ſhe was not now in Condition to pay Thoſe Funeral Rites to her Son. But the Mother was not long the Worſe, nor the Faction long the Better, for the Miſtake of a Falſe Report. For the Danger of Joſeph's Wound was quickly over; and upon returning to his Poſt again, he gave them All to Underſtand, that they ſhould pay Dearly for what they had done: But ſtill Animating the People all along to their Obedience. The Sight of Joſeph put his Friends in Countenance again, and caſt as Great a Damp upon the Hearts of the Faction.

Simon Surprizes the Town.

Joſeph wounded with a Stone, and ſaid to be Kill'd.

Titus Reſcues him, and he Recovers.

In This Extremity, there were ſeveral Deſerters went over to the Romans: ſome leapt the Wall, and made their Eſcape That way; others got-off under a Colour of purſuing the Enemy with Stones. But inſtead of avoiding One Calamity within the Town, they fell into a Worſe without; and the Surfeits they contracted in the Camp were much more Mortal, then the Famine they left at Home. For being Empty, and puff'd-up with a Dropſical Diſtemper, they could not come to their Eating again, but by little and little, without Danger of burſting: and the moſt Miſerable Part of the Story is yet behind.

There was a Fugitive ſurpriz'd among the Syrians, in the very Act of ſearching for Gold, that had been ſwallow'd, and paſs'd thorough him, as I ſaid before: Now the Faction put all People to the Scrutiny; and there was ſuch Plenty of Gold in the Town, that Twelve Atticks at preſent was as much worth as Five and Twenty heretofore. The Fame of This Diſcovery was preſently all over the Camp, and that the Jews that Deſerted had conceal'd Gold in their Gutts: whereupon, the Arabians, and the Syrians, ript-up Two Thouſand of their Bellies in One Night for their Treaſure;

The Jews carry off Gold in their Guts.

Upon This Report Two Thouſand of their Bellies were ript-up in One Night.

Treaſure: which I take to have been the moſt Barbarous Butchery the Jews ever ſuffer'd.

Titus Tranſported to the Higheſt Degree.

Titus was ſo tranſported at the Brutality of This Action, that he had certainly order'd his Horſe to put every Man of them to Death with Darts, that had a Hand in it; if the Number of the Guilty had not been ſo much Greater then That of the Slain. Hereupon he call'd his Officers together, as well Romans, as Auxiliaries, and finding ſeveral of his Own People concern'd in the Outrage, he enter'd into an Angry Expoſtulation with them upon the Whole Matter. Is it Poſſible, ſays he, (to the Romans in the Firſt Place) that any Soldier of Mine ſhould be Guilty of ſo Unmanly a Cruelty, for a Doubtful and Uncertain Advantage; and not Bluſh at the Thought of ſo Infamous and Scandalous a Purchaſe? And then again to His Auxiliaries. Can you think it Reaſonable, (ſays he) that the Inſolencies, the Murders, and the Inhumanities of the Syrians and Arabians, in a Forreign War, where they take all Manner of Licence, ſhould be Imputed to the Romans; and the Malice of the One laid at the Others Door?

Now Titus could not altogether Excuſe his Own People, and was ſo Tranſported at it, that he Threatned Death without Mercy to Any Man that ſhould preſume to Commit any of Thoſe Outrages over again: Appointing the Legions alſo at the ſame time, to make a ſtrict Search after all Suſpected Perſons, and he himſelf would have the Hearing of the Cauſe. But Avarice will ſtand all Hazzards. Beſide that,

The Love of Money the moſt Powerful of all Appetites.

Cruel People are Naturally Covetous, and the Love of Money is the Moſt Inſatiable of all Appetites. Fear and Precaution, 'tis True, in ſome Caſes may be brought to hear Reaſon: but when a People are given-up once to a Spirit of Reprobation, the Ordinary Ways and Means of Security turn to their Deſtruction: and what Cæſar ſo ſeverely Prohibited in Publique, was nevertheleſs Executed upon the Jewiſh Deſerters in Secret. Only their Cuſtom was, upon any Fugitives coming over, Firſt, to make ſure that None of the Romans ſhould be within ſight, and Then cut-up the Jews Bellies for the Execrable Booty: And when they had done, they found little more (in fine) then Vain Hopes. This Horrid Practice however frighted the Jews out of their Deſertions, and kept them from going over any longer to the Romans.

CHAP. XVI.

John Advances from Pillage to Sacrilege. The very Race of the Jews Rooted out. 600000 Dead Bodies carry'd out of the City.

From Plunder John Advances to Sacrilege.

WHEN the Pillage fail'd, John advanc'd to Sacrilege: ſeizing to his Own Uſe ſeveral Donatives and Oblations, with divers Neceſſary Veſſels for the Service of God's Worſhip; as Cups, Diſhes, Tables, &c. to the very (a) Pieces that Auguſtus, and the Empreſs, dedicated to the Honour of the Holy Temple: which the Roman Emperours had ever a Great Veneration and Eſteem for; though a Jew, at That time, had prophan'd it, and ſtript it of the very Bounties of Strangers; encouraging his Companions to take all manner of Liberty with Holy Things: For it was but Reaſon, he ſaid, that they, that Fought for the Temple, ſhould Live by't. So that he made no Scruple of diſtributing among the People the Holy Wine and Oil that was reſerv'd in the Inner Part of the Temple for Sacrifices: and as John made the Diſtribution, the Multitude took their Parts of it, Drinking, and Anointing, without any Difficulty. My Heart is Full, and I cannot forbear giving it Vent. I am perſuaded, that if the Romans had delay'd the Calling of Theſe Wicked People to an Account, This City would either have been Drown'd, or Swallow'd-up with an Earthquake: or have been deſtroy'd with Thunder and Lightning, like Sodom; the Jews being much the Wickeder People of the Two: inſomuch, that for their Stubbornneſs and Iniquity, the Whole Race of them was Rooted-out.

The Race of the Jews Rooted-out.

It would be Endleſs to run thorough the ſeveral Inſtances of their Miſery. Mannæus the Son of Lazarus, had the Command of One of the City-Gates; and going over to Titus, he gave him This Account: that from the Time of Titus's Encamping before the Town; (from the Tenth of Xanthicus to the Firſt of Panemus:) there paſs'd thorough That Gate 115080 Dead Bodies, and This was no more then what fell to his ſhare to take Notice of, by virtue of a Commiſſion to That Purpoſe: beſide what were bury'd by their Relations; that is to ſay, thrown out of the City, having no Other way of Burial. After This, upon the Computation of divers Men of Quality that deſerted, there were 600000 Poor People carry'd out of the Gate; beſide Others Innumerable, that, for want of Friends to Export their Carcaſſes out of the City, were pil'd in Heaps, and ſhut-up in Large Houſes. Wheat was by This Time valu'd at a Talent a Buſhel: and now ſince the Walling-up of the Town ſo Cloſe, that they were cut-off from all Proviſion, to the Value of a ſingle Spire of Graſs; they were brought to That Pinch of Extremity, that they were glad to rake Vaults and Sinks for Suſtenance, and to feed upon Oxe-Dung, and other Naſtineſs, enough to turn a Body's Stomach but to look upon it. The Bare Story of the Calamity drew Pity from their very Enemies; but the Faction in the City, that both ſaw and felt their Sufferings, were not ſo much as Senſible that their Own Rebellious Obſtinacy had been the Cauſe of it. But they went on, under the Fatality of a Blind Infatuation that led them on Hood-winkt, to the Irreparable Ruine both of Themſelves and of the City.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS
OF THE

BOOK VII.

CHAP. I.

The State of Jeruſalem. From a Civil War they advance to a Forreign. A Paradiſe turn'd into a Deſart. The Jews outdo the Romans. They attempt the Firing of their Engines, but fail. Jeruſalem Aſſaulted. The Jews make a Bold Defence. The Romans fall to Mining. Titus to his Army. The Jews Firm in All Extremes. Titus's Opinion of a Future State. An Encouragement to his Soldiers to do their Duty. A Gallant Action of Sabinus.

The State of Jeruſalem.

THE State of Jeruſalem was every Day Worſe and Worſe; and the Faction ſtill more and more Fierce and Turbulent, as they grew more and more Miſerable: The Famine having now taken poſſeſſion of Great and Small, all alike. It was a Sad Spectacle to ſee how the Streets were Cover'd with Dead Bodies; the Air infected, and the very Paſſages choakt-up with Carcaſſes that were trampled under Foot like the Ruines of a Fought Field; and without any Conſideration either of Terror or Pity, or how ſoon it might come to be their Own Caſe. They began with cutting one anothers Throats, and advanced from a Civil War to a Forreign; as if Divine Providence had not made Haſt enough to perfect their Deſtruction. For they did not contend ſo much for any Hope they had of Victory, as in a Tranſport of Rage and Deſpair.

From a Civil War to a Forreign.

The Romans, upon This Pinch, were hard put to't for Materials to finiſh their Works; but yet, upon cutting down all the Woods within Ninety Furlongs of the City, they made a ſhift in One and Twenty Days to raiſe their Platforms. But never ſo Diſmal a Change of Things, from a Paradiſe to a Deſart; and inſtead of the moſt Delicious Country under the Heavens, for Curious Gardens, Plantations and Houſes of Pleaſure, not ſo much as a Tree or a Cottage left ſtanding, or any Thing to be ſeen but the Marks of Deſolation and Ruine: inſomuch that Strangers could not forbear Weeping to ſee the Difference betwixt the Old Jeruſalem, and the New. For the War had ſo far defac'd the Beauty and the Glory of the Place, that it was hardly to be known again; and People Enquir'd for Jeruſalem in the very Heart of the City it ſelf.

A Paradiſe turn'd into a Deſart. Not a Stick of Wood left within Ninety Furlongs of the Town.

Upon perfecting the Mounts, the Jews and the Romans were both equally ſollicitous for the Event. The Jews were either to deſtroy them once again, or to loſe the City, and One Diſappointment more on the Other Hand would put the Romans out of Condition to repair them: for there was no more Wood to be gotten, and the Soldiers were quite haraſs'd out with the Fatigue of the Service. Not but that the Romans all this while, were more afflicted for the Calamity of the City, then the Citizens for Themſelves; who kept-up their Courage yet in deſpite of all Difficulties. But when the Romans found themſelves overreacht by Stratagem; their Inventions eluded; the Wall Proof againſt their Machines; and Themſelves worſted, in fine, at Handy-ſtrokes, their very Hearts fail'd them; eſpecially having to do with an Enemy, that inſtead of ſinking under the Diſcouragements of Faction, Famine, War, &c. rather gather'd Spirit from the Oppoſition. [What would not Theſe People do, ſaid the Romans, if they had Fortune on their ſide; that behave themſelves with This Bravery, in Defyance of all Oppoſition!] Upon This Conſideration, the Romans doubled their Guards.

The Jews too hard for the Romans.

They Attempt the Firing of the Roman Engines; but fail.

John and his People in the Caſtle of Antonia, did all that was to be done, before the Rams were Mounted, to prevent the Danger of a Breach. But it was ſo much Labour loſt, for the Deſign they had of ſetting Fire to the Mount with Flaming Torches, came to nothing. The Truth of it is, they did not behave themſelves like

Jews,

Jews, either for Union or Vigour; and ſo were forc'd upon a Retreat. But as they fell ſhort of Themſelves, on the one ſide, ſo the Romans alſo went beyond Themſelves on the Other, in planting ſo ſtrict a Guard on the Bulwarks, that there was no Poſſibility of doing any Execution by Fire: beſide, that they were reſolv'd every Man of them to dye upon the ſpot, rather then to ſubmit to ſo irreparable a Miſchief as the Loſing of That Poſt: For nothing could have put the Soldiers in a Greater Confuſion, then to ſee Brave Men trick'd upon; their Courage Baffled by a Hot-Headed Temerity; Military Diſcipline and Experience Confounded by Popular Outrage; and the Romans, in fine, ſubjected to the Jews. While the Jews advanc'd, the Romans were ready with their Darts to Encounter them; and the Foremoſt that fell did not only hinder his next Man, but the Exemplary Danger of the One, ſerv'd for a Warning to the Other. As for thoſe that preſs'd upon the Enemy's Weapons, ſome of them were ſurpriz'd at the Dignity of the Roman Order; Others, at their Numbers, and ſome again March'd off with their Wounds: ſo that in the Concluſion, they all quitted their Ground, every Man ſhifting the Blame off to his Fellow. They Blame One another.

The Aſſault was given on the Firſt of the Month Panemus; and the Jews being now drawn off, the Romans advanced with their Rams toward Antonia, in Defyance of all they were able to do; by Fire, Sword, Stones, and all other ways of Hoſtility whatſoever. Not but that the Jews depended much upon the Strength of their Walls againſt the Battery of the Machines: but they did what they could however to keep the Romans at a Diſtance, from fixing them. The Inference they drew from This way of Menage was, that the Jews were Conſcious to themſelves that Antonia was in Danger; and That this Apprehenſion made them beſtir themſelves ſo much. They continu'd the Battery, and the Wall ſtood hitherto Firm; but the Romans fortifying themſelves under the Defence of their Bucklers againſt the Shot and Stones from above, they apply'd themſelves to Digging and Mining: and when, with an Indefatigable Labour, they had looſen'd Four Stones under the Foundation of the Work, they betook themſelves on Both ſides to their Reſt. In this Interim, that part of the Wall that John had undermin'd for the Deſtruction of the Former Works, fell down all on a ſudden. This Unexpected Accident was a Surprize to Both Parties. The Jews, that had reaſon to be troubled at it, eſpecially when they might have foreſeen and Prevented it, were yet in as Good Heart as if Antonia had been their own ſtill: and the Joy of the Romans, on the other hand, for an Accident that appear'd ſo ſeaſonable, was as quickly daſh'd upon the ſight of Another Wall, that John had carry'd-up within the Former; only the Latter appear'd to be the leſs Defenſible Place of the Two, both as the Ruine of the One facilitated the Paſſage to the Other, and as the Work of the New-Wall could not yet be ſo Firm and Settled as That of Antonia. But there was no Thought of Scaling it, and coming off Alive. Jeruſalem Aſſaulted. The Jews make a Bold Defence. The Romans fall to Mining.

Titus was not now to learn the Force of Reaſoning, and Fair Words, upon the Minds of Men of Arms and Honour; or how Generous Spirits may be wrought upon by Plauſible Inſinuations of Artifice and Addreſs, into, not only the Neglect of Danger, but the very Contempt of Death it ſelf. With This Thought in his Head, he ſummoned the Flower of his Army together, and ſpake to them after This Manner.

[My Brave Fellow-Soldiers, there can be no Place for Encouragements, where there is no Danger: Neither would it become Me to Offer it, as if you wanted it; or you to Take it. Exhortations are more properly for Doubtful Caſes, wherein all Brave Men will Adviſe themſelves. It will be a Hard Work, I muſt Confeſs, to Maſter the Wall we have here before us: But Great Souls are given us for Great and Glorious Exploits; and Death is an Advantage when it is follow'd with Immortal Fame for a Reward: beſide that it ſhall be my Care to Reward Thoſe that Deſerve it. In the Firſt place, I would have you think of That for your Encouragement, that works a Contrary Effect upon Others. I ſpeak of the Inſuperable Patience and Conſtancy of the Jews in the Worſt of Fortunes. As what can be more Ignominious, then for the Military Romans, that Study War in Peace, and are ſo wonted to Conquer, that it is almoſt Natural to them to be Victorious: for Theſe, I ſay, to be beaten out of their Strength and Courage by the Jews; and at the Latter End of the Day too, with God's Providence moſt Evidently on their ſide; and the Enemy nothing to ſupport them, but the Fury of their Own Extravagant Deſpairs; beſide that they ſuffer daily under the Judicial Vengeance of God's High Diſpleaſure in Our Favour: Witneſs their Factions, Famine, Siege, and the Ruine of their Walls, even without Battery; which are but ſo many Declarations from Heaven againſt them, to Our Advantage. It will not become Us therefore to truckle to our Inferiours, and to caſt-off the Divine Protection. Shall the Jews that have been train'd-up to Slavery, and conſequently little or no Credit to loſe upon That Account: ſhall Titus to the Flower of his Army. The Jews Firm and Steady in All Extremes.

ſhall Theſe People, I ſay, have the Bravery to Charge into the Middle of the Roman Troups, and look Death in the Face, rather then run a Riſque of the ſame Condition over again; and all This, in a Freak of Oſtentation and Vanity, without the Leaſt Hope or Proſpect of Succeſs: and ſhall we, on the Other hand, that are effectually the Lords and Maſters of the Univerſe, and in a manner Entitled to a Right of Conqueſt: ſhall we, I ſay, lye ſtill, and Idle, without ſo much as one Bold Attempt upon our Adverſaries, waiting only in our Arms, till Hunger and Fortune ſhall give-up the Enemy, without any Difficulty, into our Hands. 'Tis but taking Antonia once, and the Town is our Own. Or, in caſe we ſhould meet with any Reſiſtance from within, (which I do not expect) it would not be Worth the ſpeaking of; for the Advantage of the Higher Ground lays the Enemy at our Feet without All Hope of Recovery. I do not take upon me here to Celebrate the Hiſtory of Thoſe Heroes, that, having Ended their Days in the Field of Battle, ſhall yet Live in the Memory of Future Ages to Perpetuity. As for Thoſe Worthleſs Wretches that think of going down Body and Soul into the Grave together, I wiſh them a Death ſuitable to That Abjection of Mind. No Man of Senſe and Spirit can be ſo far Ignorant of the State of Souls Departed, as not to Underſtand that Thoſe that fall by the Fate of War, are immediately tranſlated into the Heavens among the Stars, to appear from thence, to their Poſterity like Good Angels, or Influences to prepare them on the Other ſide for Thoſe Manſions of Bliſs. But for Thoſe that dye in their Bed, as we ſay, or of ſome Bodily Diſeaſe, Their Souls, from that Inſtant, are bury'd in Darkneſs, let them be never ſo Pure; and their Names and Memories for ever Sunk and Forgotten. Now ſince ſo it is, that Death is Inevitable, and that the Sword compar'd with any Diſeaſe is the Eaſier Death of the Two, how Mean and Degenerous a Cowardice would it be to withdraw the Uſe of a Life from the Service of the Publique, which is an Indiſpenſible Debt to Nature, and a Man's Country.

Titus his Notion of a Future State.

This may look, perhaps, as if I took the Storming of This Wall to be certain Death; but Reſolution is above Danger; and he that Fears nothing, deſpairs of nothing. The Fall of the Firſt Wall has Open'd a Way to the reſt; and the Second will be eaſily over-born, if you do but Encourage and Support one another: only ſtand Firm, and your very Numbers will do the Work: and who knows at laſt but you may carry your Point without Blood too. You are to prepare however for a Vigorous Oppoſition, and to aſſure your ſelves that, upon any Advantage either by Stratagem, or by Force, they will never be able to withſtand us. And for Him that firſt Mounts the Breach, it ſhall be My Care, whether he Lives or Dyes, to Crown him with Honours and Rewards.

He that does well ſhall be ſure of Honour and Reward.

Theſe Words of Titus caſt ſuch a Damp upon the Spirits of the Army, that there was But one Man in the Field had the Heart to anſwer the End of this Diſcourſe. His Name was Sabynus; a Syrian Born, and a Soldier of the Guards; and a Man Eminent both for Courage, and Execution: One that had never ſeen him before, would hardly have taken him for a Military Man, either by his Make, or by his Faſhion: a Little Black Fellow; but with a Soul too Large for his Body. This Man made his Reverence, and Addreſs'd himſelf to Titus in Words to This Effect. [I do here make a Tender of my ſelf to Cæſar with all my Heart, for the Firſt Man to give the Aſſault. May Cæſar's Fortune anſwer Sabinus's Good Will. Or if I ſhould Miſcarry in the Attempt; what I looſe one way, I get another, in the Honour of laying down my Life for my Maſter: Which makes it all one to me whether I Live, or Dye.]

A Glorious Action of Sabinus, one of the Guards to Titus; and the Glorious End he made.

Upon Theſe Words, with his Sword drawn in his Right Hand, and his Shield over his Head in his Left, he advanced toward the Wall about the Sixth Hour of the Day, with a Train of Eleven Men at his Heels, that follow'd him purely in Emulation of his Virtue: Sabinus, in This Action, encountered all the Enemy's Stones and Shot, with a Spirit more then Humane; and ſeveral of his Followers were knock'd down upon That Attaque. But This did not hinder Sabinus yet from preſſing forward upon the Enemy's Darts and Arrows, till he had well nigh Mounted the Wall, and forced the Jews to Abandon their Station, for fear of an Enforcement of Greater Numbers to overpower them. But what ſhall we ſay now to the Spiteful Malignity of Fortune, that takes delight to croſs all Virtuous Undertakings; for when This Heroe was juſt upon the perfecting of his Work, he was moſt Unluckily overborn with the Fall of a Stone. The Jews looking behind them upon the Noſe; and finding Sabinus lying alone there, and in a manner ſenſeleſs, they all fell upon him with their Darts. He defended himſelf upon his Knees, with his Buckler over his Head, as long as he could, and revenged himſelf upon his Enemies with his Sword: killing ſome, and wounding others, till in the End, being able to Strike no longer, he breath'd his Laſt under a Shower of their Darts.

The Bravery of This Man deſerv'd a more Propitious Fate; but he dy'd yet as Great as he liv'd. Three of his Companions were cruſh'd to death with Stones from the Top of the Wall; and there were Eight more carry'd-off wounded to the Camp. This Action paſs'd upon the Third Day of the Month Panemus.

CHAP. II.

The Romans find the Guards aſleep at Antonia, and cut their Throats. A Terrible Fight upon it with a Great Slaughter and Confuſion. A Battle of Ten Hours; and the Jews get the Better of it.

TWO Days after This, there were gotten together Twenty of the Guards of the Platforms; the Enſign of the Fifth Legion; Two Cavaliers, and a Trumpet: and making a ſilent March over the Ruines up to Antonia, in the Dead of the Night, without any Oppoſition, they found the Advance-Guards faſt aſleep; cut their Throats; and ſo taking Poſſeſſion of the Wall, the Trumpet ſounded. Upon This Alarum, the reſt Wak'd, and fled; without waiting to ſee what Numbers had enter'd the Place; but betwixt Fear and Phancy, they gave them for granted to be very Strong. Titus immediately, upon This Notice, put himſelf in the Head of the Choiceſt Troups he had about him, and ſo took his way up the Ruines. The Jews were ſo ſtartled at This Surprize, that ſome of them made for the Inner-Temple; Others, toward the Mine that John had wrought to ſupplant the Roman Works: But the Two Factions of John and Simon giving all for Loſt, if the Romans ſhould get the Temple, there follow'd a Fierce and an Obſtinate Combat upon it, before the very Doors of the Place: the One Fighting for Life; the Other, for Victory. Launces and Darts were of Little or no Uſe on either Hand; but the Controverſy was now decided by the Sword. In This Confuſion, there was no Diſtinguiſhing who and who were together; but all crouding, without either Order, or Diſcipline: and ſuch a Meddley of Outcries, that there was no Underſtanding One Another. The Slaughter was Great on Both ſides, and the Ground Cover'd with Arms and Carcaſſes. There was no Place either to run away, or to Purſue: but as they had the Better, or the Worſe of it, they advanc'd, or retir'd; Shouting, and Exalting on the One Hand, and Lamenting on the Other. The Front of Both Armies was of Neceſſity either to kill, or to be kill'd; for there was no Diſtance left betwixt them for a Retreat. The Battle, in fine, laſted Ten Hours: That is to ſay, from the Ninth Hour over-night to the Seventh next Morning. But the Furious Obſtinacy of the Jews carry'd it from the Reſolution and Conduct of the Romans; and it was well for them, they did ſo, for their Laſt Adventure was at Stake. But the Romans, in the Concluſion, contented themſelves for the preſent, that they had gotten Antonia, with only one Part of their Army; for the Legions, upon whom they chiefly depended, were not as yet come-up.

A ſharp Fight upon it.

With a Great Slaughter and Confuſion.

A Battle of Ten Hours, and the Jews carry it.

CHAP. III.

A Brave Exploit of One Julian a Centurion; and as notable a Misfortune. The Romans ſhut up in Antonia. The Names of the Jews that ſignaliz'd themſelves upon This Occaſion.

THere was One Julian, a Native of Bithynia, and a Centurion; a Man well Born, and the Braveſt to all manner of Martial Purpoſes, that ever I heard of in the Whole War. This Julian, as he was ſtanding by Titus in Antonia, and the Romans at that time giving way to the Jews, he took his Opportunity, and made a Deſperate Leap on a ſudden into the Thickeſt of the Enemy, and ſo gave them Chace in his ſingle Perſon up to the Innermoſt Corner of the Temple. This Prodigious Action put the Multitude into ſuch an Amazement, that there was more in it (they thought) then the Bare Force of Fleſh and Bloud. But Julian purſu'd his Courſe; ſome he overturn'd; Others he overtook, and put to death: Nothing, in ſhort, was more Agreeable to Ceſar's Friends, or a more Dreadful Spectacle to his Enemies. But there was a Fatality yet that befell This Man, not to be foreſeen, or avoided. For having his Shoes Studded with Iron-Nails, after the Faſhion of Other Soldiers, as he was running a Courſe upon the Pavement, he got a ſlip; and the Romans, upon the Claſh of his Arms, brake into an Outcry, for fear he might have done himſelf ſome Miſchief. The Jews at the ſame time fell upon him with with Swords and Darts, while he Fenc'd-off ſeveral Blows with his Buckler; and ſtill as he try'd to get up again, he was born down with Multitudes. And yet, ſuch was the Proof of his Arms, that even at his Length upon the Ground, they had ſome Difficulty to Diſpatch him. But, what with Loſs of Bloud, and other Weakneſs, and no Mortal to ſuccour him, he gave-up the Ghoſt.

It went to the Heart of Cæſar, to ſee ſo Brave a Man made ſo Publique and ſo Deplorable a Spectacle; and eſpecially to find himſelf under the Utter Impoſſibility of ſaving a Perſon he had ſo Great a mind to preſerve. But there were Others that might have reliev'd him, if they had had but the Courage to Attempt it. Julian, in fine, after a long Struggle with Humane Frailty, and leaving ſeveral of his Murderers wounded behind him, he departed This Life, to his Everlaſting Honour, both with Friends and Foes. The Jews at laſt carry'd-off the Dead Body; and after Another Rout to the Romans, ſhut them-up in Antonia. The Jews that ſignaliz'd themſelves in This Action, were Alexas, and (a) Gyphthæus of John's Party: and of Simon's Faction, there were Malachias, and Judas the Son of Merton: James the Son of Sozas, Captain of the Idumæans; Simon and Judas the Sons of Jair.

CHAP. IV.

Titus Invites John out to a Fair Battle. John's Ribaldry in Return. John Deliberates upon the Matter. Jechonias's Piety and Prudence. The Fate of Jeruſalem draws on: and God puniſhes the Jews by the Hand of the Romans. The Jews give it out that the Romans put all the Deſerters to Death; but Titus proves the Contrary. Titus has no Hand in Theſe Abominations.

Titus, being now reſolv'd to tear-up the Foundations of Antonia, and to level the Ways for the more Commodious March of the Army, he called for Joſeph, and (underſtanding that on that day, which was the Seventeenth of the Month Panemus, the Solemnity of their Daily Sacrifice could not be obſerv'd for want of a Congregation, and that the People were much troubled at it) ſent him to John a ſecond time upon the ſame Errand: That is to ſay; if John had a mind to Fight, let him bring what Numbers he pleas'd, and he ſhould have the Liberty to put it to a Battle; provided only that the City and the Temple might not be expoſed in the Common Ruine; and that he would give over Prophaning God's Holy Name and Worſhip. Or, if he had a Deſire to revive the Religious Services that had been for ſome time diſcontinu'd, he might appoint which of the Jews he pleas'd, to Officiate.

He Invites John out to a Fair Battle, for the ſaving of the Temple and City.

Now Joſeph did not think it ſufficient to acquit himſelf of This Commiſſion to John Alone; but mounting an Eminence where he might be furtheſt heard, he communicated Cæſar's Pleaſure to the Jews, in Hebrew, as loud as he could deliver it: begging of the Jews all the while to have Compaſſion of their Country, and to prevent the Burning of the Temple, before it was too Late; with Liberty to Solemnize their Prayers, and Sacrifices, as formerly.

The People gave Joſeph a Sorrowful Hearing, without ſo much as one Word ſpeaking. But John, after ſeveral Virulent Outrages againſt Joſeph, ſuperadded This Irony; That there was no Danger of Jeruſalem, if it was the City of God.

John's Execrable Ribaldry in Return.

[No doubt of it, ſays Joſeph, (interrupting him with a Loud Voice) you have made a Conſcience of keeping Every Thing Pure and Holy, and of paying your Duty to That God from whom you pretend to look for Help. What would you think of That Man now, but as the Worſt of Enemies, that ſhould rob you of your Daily Bread? And yet at the ſame time you make no Difficulty at all of robbing Almighty God of his Daily Sacrifices and Oblations. And what's your Quarrel, after This, to the Romans, but for ſtanding-up in Defence of your Own Laws and Worſhip; which you your ſelf ſuppreſs. Never was there ſo Miſerable a Turn of Religion and State! Strangers and Enemies to do the Office of your Beſt Friends: and the Jews Themſelves, both by Bloud, and Education, crueller then Barbarians, one to another. But Repentance is never out of ſeaſon, let the Caſe be never ſo Deſperate. As in the Inſtance of Jechonias the King of the Jews; who, when the Babylonians made War upon Jeruſalem, quitted the Town upon Choice, before it was Taken, and gave-up Himſelf, Mother and Relations, for Hoſtages, to ſave the Holy City and Temple from being laid in Aſhes. The Name and Honour of This Prince ſtands upon Record to This Day, in an Anniverſary Solemnity, to the Memory of That Illuſtrious Action. I cannot recommend you to a more Pertinent, or Seaſonable Preſident: and let your Diſtreſs or Offence be what it will, My Life for yours, the Romans ſhall Pardon it; Wherefore Conſider well with your ſelf, who it is that adviſes you; What they are to whom

I paſs This Promiſe; What moves me to it, and in Whoſe Name I undertake it. Heaven forbid that I ſhould ever ſubmit to be ſo mean a Slave, as to forget what I owe to the Place of my Nativity, and to the Laws of my Country And after all This, what do I get for my Good Will now; but Freſh Indignities, Railings, and Injuries? And All This is not yet ſo Bad neither as I deſerve, for Endeavouring to Preſerve a ſort of People that Fate and Providence are reſolved to Deſtroy. What can be Clearer then the Frequent Predictions we meet with in Hiſtory, pointing at the Deſtruction of This Miſerable City; and that the Time of it is then near at Hand, when the Jews are tearing out the Hearts one of another. Now This is ſo far come to paſs, that not only the Houſes, but the Temples, are Polluted with the Bloud of your Own Tribes. And what is all This now, but the Divine Judgment of God, Puniſhing the Jews by the Hand of the Romans; which will probably End in Purging the City by Fire.

The Fate of Jeruſalem near at hand.

God puniſhes the Jews by the Hands of the Romans.

Joſeph could go no further for Sobs and Tears, which put the Romans into a Tender Admiration at the Softneſs and Humanity of his very Diſpoſition: But the more Joſeph lamented, the more Implacable were John and his Confederates againſt the Romans; inſomuch that they lay in way to Enveigle Joſeph into a Snare. But his Diſcourſe wrought very effectually upon ſeveral of the Nobility. There were Divers of the Factions alſo, that finding the Caſe Deſperate, and giving all for loſt, would have gone over to the Romans, if they durſt have ſtirr'd for Fear of their Own Guards. But Others there were, that taking their Opportunity, gave their Own Companions the ſlip; in which Number were the High-Prieſts, Joſeph and Jeſus; the Three Sons of Iſmael that had his Head cut-off at Cyrene; Four Sons of Matthias; and One Son of Another Matthias, who made his eſcape to the Romans, after Simon the Son of Gioras had put the Father and Three of his Sons to death, as has been ſaid already. There were alſo a Great Number of Perſons of Condition that deſerted with the Prieſts; who were Graciouſly received by the Emperour, but ſent away to Gophne for the Preſent, with a Promiſe of Large Poſſeſſions to be diſtributed among them at the End of the War. Titus gave them This Aſſignment by Themſelves, to avoid the Uneaſineſs of a Mixt Converſation among People of Differing Manners, Laws, and Cuſtoms; and they were very Thankful for the Allotment.

Several of the Better ſort give their Companions the ſlip.

When they were all withdrawn to their Colony, and none of them ſeen any longer in the City, the Faction ſtarted a Spiteful Report; how the Romans kill'd all the Deſerters as faſt as they came over to them, with a Deſign to fright Others from leaving their Companions. This Invention ſucceeded once again, as before; but Titus being now aware of the Stratagem, call'd them All back again from Gophne, and Order'd them to take the Tour of the Walls with Joſeph, and ſhew themſelves to the Town; which brought over more Proſelites to the Romans then ever. As they were gather'd together upon This Occaſion, they planted themſelves in the ſight of the Romans; and preſſing the Faction with Importunities, and Lamentations, begg'd of them either to take the Romans into the Town, and deliver their Country; or otherwiſe quit the Temple, to prevent the Firing of it; which the Romans would never agree to but upon the Laſt Extremity. This did but make the Faction more and more Outrageous againſt the Fugitives, with their Stones, Darts, Arrows, Slings and other Neceſſary Engines; which being planted at the very Gates, made the Temple liker a Place of Arms then a Houſe of Religious Worſhip: and the Dead Bodies lay every where ſo thick about it, as if it were a Common Burying Place. They Brake alſo into the Holy Sanctuary, with their Arms ſtill warm and reeking in the Bloud of their Countrymen; and advancing to ſuch a Degree of Extravagance, that the Romans pay'd a Greater Reverence to the Jewiſh Rites and Ceremonies, then the Jews did to their Own. There was not a Man in Titus's Army that had not a Veneration for the Temple it ſelf, and for the God that was worſhipp'd there, and that did not heartily wiſh to ſee the Faction repent while there was yet Place left for Mercy.

But Titus proves it a Manifeſt Impoſture.

The Roman Army to a Man, had a Veneration for the Holy Temple.

Titus was ſo ſenſibly Touch'd with the Caſe of Theſe Wretched People, that he made one Tryal more yet, how far John, and his Confederates might be wrought upon by Reaſon. [Tell me, ſays he, you Inhumane Miſcreants! What were all the Bars and Partitions for, about This Holy Place; with the Latin and Greek Inſcriptions upon Theſe Pillars; forbidding all People upon a Penalty, not to paſs This Encloſure? Neither have We Our ſelves been leſs Tender of your Privileges, in making it Death for any Man to paſs Theſe Bounds, not excepting the Romans Themſelves. How comes the Sanctuary after This, to be prophan'd with Aſſaſſinations and Murders, and the Temple defil'd with Bloud, Forrein and Domeſtick. I appeal to all the Gods of my Country, and to the Late Patron of This Holy Temple: (who hath now forſaken it) to my Army; to the Jews that have join'd with me, and finally to your ſelves, that I am Innocent of all Theſe Abominations: and I do ſacredly promiſe, that, if you will but Comply in quitting This Holy Titus has no hand in Theſe Abominations.

Place, no Man ſhall approach or offer it any Indignity; but that I'le preſerve and protect your Temple even whether you will or no.

CHAP. V.

Titus forced upon the War. He Forms his Party; and poſts himſelf upon Fort Antonia. An Attaque in the Night follow'd with a Diſmal Uproar and Confuſion. Day-light brings them into Order again. A drawn Battle at laſt. Several Jewiſh Heroes that Fought Bravely. Four Mounts Erected. A Bloudy Diſpute. A Famous Action of One Pedanius. The Jews Fire the Temple-Galleries. A Phantaſtical Challenge. Jonathan Kills Pudens; and Priſcus Kills Jonathan.

Titus forced upon a War.

He Forms his Party.

TITUS, upon This Occaſion, made Uſe of Joſeph for his Interpreter; but the Faction made a Wrong Conſtruction of it, and imputed the Fairneſs of the Application rather to Fear, then Good Will, and the Jews grew Inſolent upon That Miſtake. When Titus found they had no regard, either to the Temple, or to Themſelves, he took up a Reſolution, though never ſo much againſt his Mind, to Carry-on the War. But for his Whole Army, there was not Room enough to draw it up: ſo that he detach'd Thirty out of Every Company; with a Tribune in the Head of Every Thouſand, and Cerealis to Command them all in Chief. With this Detachment they were to have fallen on upon the Enemy's Guards about the Ninth Hour of the Night; and Titus Himſelf to have led on the Attacque: But upon a Council of War, the Officers were all of Opinion for Titus rather to poſt Himſelf upon the Fort Antonia, where he might ſee and Obſerve how his Men Acquitted themſelves, without Running the Riſque of any Common Danger in his own Perſon: beſide, that it would Inſpire his People with a new Soul, to ſhew their Bravery in the ſight of their General.

An Attacque order'd at a ſet-Hour in the Night.

Titus, in fine, render'd himſelf to the Reaſons of his Officers and Friends: and ſo withdrew to a Watch-Tower in Antonia, where he might ſee and Judge of the Whole Action: Charging his Officers at the ſame time to take ſtrict Notice who did Well, or Ill, that he might ſee them Rewarded, or Puniſh'd accordingly. The Matter was no ſooner ſettled, but Order was given, and an Hour Appointed for the Attaque. The Romans did not find the Enemy aſleep This Bout, as was Expected; but the Advance Guards came preſently to Blows, with a Confuſion of Clamours; and, upon Wakening their Fellows, brought them-on in Multitudes to ſecond them. The Romans ſtood the Firſt Shock; but the Numbers that follow'd fell indifferently upon their Own People, without knowing Friend and Foe aſunder: for betwixt the Noiſe of the Uproar, and the Darkneſs of the Night, they knew neither Voices nor Faces apart; but following the Impulſe only of a Blind Rage and Paſſion, they fell Foul upon what came next in their Way at a Venture. Now the Romans that kept themſelves in Orderly Bodies all This While, under the Cover of their Bucklers, and knew one another by the Word, or Signal; Theſe People made a Tolerable Shift in the Scuffle; whereas the Jews mov'd not one Sober Step off or on: but taking their Enemies for their Friends, and their Friends for their Enemies, the Jews deſtroy'd more of their Own Men then the Romans Themſelves did. But upon Break of Day, ſo ſoon as the Light ſhew'd them their Miſtakes, they betook themſelves to a more Regular Way of Combat, and fell to their Darts and Arrows; Both Sides as Freſh and Vigorous, as if they had done Nothing all Night. Now the Romans, that had Titus for the Judge, the Witneſs, and the Spectator of their Behaviour, and look'd upon the Bravery of That Day's Action as the Foundation of their Future Fortunes, fought one and all in a Noble Strife and Æmulation, who ſhould do Beſt: while the Jews at the ſame time had their Own Lives and the Temple at Stake, with the Tyrant John in the Head of them; Cajoling ſome with Fair Words, and Treating Others with Menaces or Blows. This Fight was moſt of it hand to hand, but with various Changes back and forward; for there was hardly any Room either for Flight or Purſuit. Antonia was in Effect, but a kind of Theatre to the Battle; Titus, and his Friends, the Spectators; calling out to the Actors one while to follow their Advantage; other while to ſtand their Ground, as they ſaw Occaſion: and there paſs'd nothing that ſcap'd their Obſervation. The Diſpute laſted, in fine, from the Ninth Hour of the Night to the Fifth the next Day; Both Sides maintaining their Ground; and coming, in the Concluſion, to a Drawn-Battle. There were ſeveral Noble Romans that behav'd themſelves like Heroes; and the moſt Remarkable Captains of the Jews, were as follows.

Day-Light brings them into Order.

Of

Of Simon's Party, there was Judas the Son of Merton, and Simon the Son of Josias; Jacob, the Son of Sosa; and Simon the Son of Cahthlas, (Idumæans.) And then of John's Disciples, there were Gyphthæus and Alexas; and of the Zelotes, there was Simon the Son of Jair. Several Jewish Officers that fought like Heroes upon This Encounter.

In the Compass of Seven Days, the Foundations of Antonia were all turn'd-up to the Bottom, and a Broad Way cut-out for the Legions to March-up to the Wall; where they immediately fell to Work upon Four Mounts: The First, over-against the Corner of the Inner-Temple that looks North and East: The Second, against the Gallery, to the North-ward betwixt the Two Gates: The Third, toward the West-Porch of the Outward-Temple; And the Fourth, towards the North-Porch. But it was an Infinite Charge and Labour, the bringing of the Materials a Hundred Furlongs from the Place: beside the many Surprizes they met withall by the Way; for the Romans were Over-Confident and Careless, and the Jews Mad and Rash enough to venture upon any thing. The Passes about Antonia Levell'd. Four Mounts Erected.

It was the Practice of several of the Romans, when they went-out a Foraging, to turn their Horses loose a-Grazing; and it was then a Common thing for the Jews to Sally-out upon so Fair an Opportunity, and carry them-off. This happen'd so often, that Titus imputed it at last rather to the Negligence of the Romans, then to the Daring Industry of the Jews. And he found himself much in the Right too; for upon the putting of One Soldier to death for the Loss of his Horse, it secur'd all the rest; for the Soldiers and their Horses never parted after.

When they had now raised their Platforms, and put themselves in Condition to Mount their Attacques against the Temple, there came down the next Day a Rabble of a Faction, that were ready to Starve in the City for want of Pillage. This Seditious Crew about the Eleventh Hour of the Day, made an Effort upon the Roman Guards toward the (a) Mount of Olivet, in Hope of either taking them at Unawares, or finding them withdrawn. The Romans saw the Storm a-coming; and taking the Alarum in time, drew out all the Strength they were able to make, and put a Check to a most Desperate Attempt they had projected upon the Wall. It came, in short, to a Bloudy Dispute, and there were Great Things done on Both Sides; the Romans valuing themselves upon the Reputation of their Prowess and Military Conduct; and the Jews flattering themselves in the Force of a Fool-hardy and a Mistaken Valour. The One fought for Shame; the Other upon Necessity: for the Romans look'd upon the Jews to be now as good as Noos'd; and could never have wip'd-off the Disgrace, if they had let them go again: and the Jews, on the Other Hand, had no way of coming-off but by forcing the Romans. An Attacque, and a Bloudy Dispute upon it.

There goes a Wonderful Story of one Pedanius, a Roman Cavalier, which is thus. The Jews happen'd to be Routed once, and pursu'd by the Besiegers into the Valley: This same Pedanius pushing full speed after them, overtook a Corpulent Young Man, and Heavy Arm'd, spurring for Life. He took him-off from his Horse by the Leg, in the Middle of his Course, and carry'd him away a Prisoner, for a Present to Cæsar. Titus was in High Admiration at the Strength and Address of This Man: but the Prisoner was put to death upon't, for the Villany of the Attempt; Titus's Heart at the same time being set upon the Dispatch and Finishing of the Great Work. A Wonderful Exploit of One Pedanius.

The Jews finding themselves every Day Weaker and Weaker; the War Hotter, and the Contagion ready to seize the very Temple it self, the Jews did in This Case, as Men do in Pestilential Distempers, by cutting-off the Infected Parts, to save the Body. According to This Allegory, the Jews began with setting Fire to That Part of the Gallery that, reaching from the North to the East, faced Antonia; where they made a Gap of near Twenty Cubits, and wrought the Final Destruction of the Holy Place with their Own Hands. The Jews set Fire to the Temple Galleries.

On the Four and Twentieth of the Month above-mention'd, the Romans put the same Gallery in a Flame; and when the Fire had gain'd Fourteen Cubits, the Jews took down the Roof of it; and so went-on still cutting-off all Communication with Antonia; Not but that they might have hinder'd the Burning of it, if they would, as they ought to have done; but Their Way was to Regulate the Mischief they did by their Own Convenience: and all this While there pass'd Daily Skirmishes and Encounters every where about the Temple.

There was at This time a Contemptible Figure of a Man, that was a Jew; a Dwarfish, ill-lookt Fellow: and as Despicable for his Fortune and Family, as otherwise; and his Name was Jonathan. He went out One Day to the Monument of John the High-Priest, and There talking Vain-Gloriously of himself, he made a Challenge to any Man of the Whole Roman Army to meet him with his Sword in his Hand. A Phantastical Challenge of One Jonathan.

Gr. Ελαιῶν ὄρος.

There was no Body appear'd to take him up; but ſome Deſpis'd him; Others, as it falls-out many times in Thoſe Caſes, were afraid of him: ſome were not for Fighting, they ſaid, with a Man that had a mind to Dye; nor others with Men in Deſpair, that Fear neither God nor Man; or, where there is Honour to be Loſt on the one ſide, and none to be gotten on the other: Beſide that a Brute and a Man are not upon Equal Terms. When This Inſolent Scoffing Jew had waited a Long time for a Champion, deſcanting upon the Cowardice of the Romans, and No Body came; there was a Proud Arrogant Man, and a Roman Cavalier, one Pudens, that out of an Indignation for This Affront, ſtood forth inconſiderately enough, and accepted the Challenge; which in the End made Sport for the Company: the Contempt he had for the Jew made him Raſh and Careleſs; ſo that getting an Unlucky Stumble, Jonathan made his Advantage of it, and kill'd him when he was down: trampling the Dead Body under his Feet, and Vapouring over it with his Buckler in his Left-hand, and his Bloudy Sword in his Right, clattering his Arms together, and inſulting at the ſame time with Foul Language, and Ribaldry, both againſt his Adverſary and the Spectators of the Roman Army. While Jonathan was in the Height of his Buffoonry and Exultation; Priſcus, a Centurion, ſhot him through the Heart with an Arrow; which ſtruck him Dead upon the Body of his Enemy. This put both Jews and Romans into an Uproar, though upon Differing Motives, and was look'd upon as a Juſt Judgment upon Jonathan for aſſuming That to his Virtue, which was only Due to his Fortune.

A War betwixt the Temple and the Mounts. The Jews Confound the Romans by a Stratagem. Titus pities them. The Bravery of Longus. A Strange Eſcape of Artorius.

THE Faction in the Temple was now in Open War with the Soldiers upon the Mounts; and on the 27th of the Month aforeſaid, the Jews bethought Themſelves of This Stratagem. They fill'd the Roof of the Weſtern Porch, betwixt the Top of it and the Timbers, with a Quantity of Dry Wood, Sulphur, and Bituminous Matter: and then pretending to give way upon an Attacque, they ſuffer'd themſelves to be beaten-out, as if they had not been able to maintain it. A Company of Raſh People follow'd them Cloſe upon the Purſuit, and ſet-up Ladders to make good what the Other had quitted: but the Wiſer ſort look'd upon the Whole to be a Trick, and never ſtirr'd for the Matter. Upon the Romans Crouding into the Porch, the Jews ſet Fire to't, and all was immediately in a Blaze; to the Aſtoniſhment even of Thoſe that were out of reach of it; but the moſt Deſperate Horrour and Confuſion of the reſt imaginable. Some plung'd themſelves into Wells and Pits; Others leapt head-long down the Houſes; ſome running one Way, ſome Another: ſome ſmother'd in the Flame, and Others caſting themſelves upon their Swords to prevent One Death by Another.

An Open War betwixt the Temple and the Mount:. The Jews Deſtroy the Romans by a Stratagem.

This Spectacle went to the Heart of Cæſar, out of a Generous Compaſſion he had for the Calamity of ſo Diſmal a Miſcarriage: Not but that he was Offended with his Soldiers to the very Death, for Venturing upon ſuch an Attaque without Orders. But they had This Comfort however in their Diſtreſs, that to ballance the Loſs of their Lives they had the Love and the Pity of the Prince for whom they dy'd; for they could ſee him calling and labouring up and down to do all that was poſſible for their Relief: and Every Inſtance of his Affection was look'd upon as a Memorial to his Immortal Honour. As for Thoſe that made a Shift to ſcape the Fury of the Flames, they were beſet by the Jews, and after a Stout Reſiſtance Every Man of them put to the Sword.

Titus pities Them with a Generous Compaſſion.

There fell a World of Brave Men in This Terrible Adventure; but none Greater then one Longus; who, with Honour to all the reſt in General, muſt not be forgotten upon This Occaſion in Particular. This Longus was a Roman, and in the Vigour of his Youth. The Jews found him a Daring, and a Dangerous Man, and had no way to cut him off unleſs they could get him down to them, upon Honour, that he ſhould return Safe again without any Violence to his Perſon. His Brother Cornelius taking Notice of This, call'd out to him on the Other Hand; adjuring him not to do any thing that either his Country or himſelf ſhould have Reaſon to be aſham'd of. Longus, upon This, drew his Sword, and in the ſight of Both Parties kill'd Himſelf.

The Bravery of Longus.

There

There was alſo One Artorius that deliver'd himſelf from the Fire by an Artificial Addreſs. He was reduc'd to an Extremity; and ſeeing one Lucius his Fellow-Soldier, and Comrade, within Call. [Catch me in thy Arms, ſays he, and break my Fall, and I'll make thee my Heir.] Artorius took his Leap; and the other diſpoſing himſelf to receive him, the Weight of the One deſtroy'd the Other; daſhing him to pieces upon the Place. This Miſcarriage for the Preſent made many a ſad Heart among the Romans; but it kept them afterward upon a Better Guard againſt the Frauds and Subtilties of the Jews, which were very Sly and Dangerous to Thoſe that were not well aware of them. A Strange Eſcape of Artorius.

The Porch was burnt as far as the Tower that John Erected in his War with Simon, upon the Pillars that led to it: and the Jews, after the Burning of the Romans, as above, brake down the reſt. On the Day following, the Romans put Fire alſo to the North-Porch, and ſo carry'd it before them to That on the Eaſt, that overlooks the Vally of Cedron, from a Precipice that turns a Body's Brain to look down it.

CHAP. VII.

The Extreme Miſery that Attends Famine.

THis was the Face of Things about the Temple: the City well nigh depopulated with a Devouring Famine, and the Miſery of it not to be Number'd or Expreſs'd. It was enough to Create a War in a Family, to have but any Jealouſie of Meat in't, and enough to break the Tendereſt Friendſhips in Nature. Thoſe that were evidently Starv'd to death could not yet be believed at the laſt Gaſp, that they dy'd in Want: but they would ſearch the very Boſoms of the Dead for Bread, when they had no longer any Breath in their Bodies. If they miſs'd what they look'd for, their Deſpairs hurry'd them up and down raging like Mad Dogs, and Staggering like ſo many Drunken Men; ranſacking the ſame Houſes at every Nook and Corner of them over and over again: Nothing coming amiſs to them, which the Fouleſt of Brutes themſelves would boggle at: Girdles, Shoo-Leather, Beaſt's Skins, &c. Nay a Handful of Old Hay was ſold for Four Atticks. But why do I trouble my ſelf with Illuſtrations of This Dreadful Judgment, by Things Inanimate; having at hand ſuch an Inſtance for Matter of Fact as was never known, either among Greeks, or Barbarians! and the Story is not to be Heard, or Reported without Horrour. I could be well enough content to paſs over This Relation, leſt Poſterity ſhould take me for a Falſary: but I have ſo many Witneſſes to the Truth of it, that I ſhould be Wanting to my Country in ſuch a Partiality to the Dead, as to ſuppreſs it. No Diſtreſs like that of a Famine.

CHAP. VIII.

A Mother Dreſſes and Eats the Fleſh of her Own Son. Cæſar Innocent upon the Whole Matter.

THere was a Certain Woman beyond Jordan, whoſe Name was Mary. She was the Daughter of Eleazar, of the Village (a) Vetezobra: That is to ſay [The Houſe of Hyſop:] Rich and Well-Born. She fled in Company with ſeveral Others, and took Sanctuary in Jeruſalem; where they had the Fortune to be Beſieg'd. The Tyrants ſtript This Lady of all ſhe brought publiquely along with her, that was Precious: and for any thing elſe that was Conceal'd, either Goods or Proviſions; her Houſe was daily broken-up and Rifled by the Soldiers. Upon This Uſage, the Woman fell foul upon the Faction with the Bittereſt and the moſt Outrageous Language; but could not prevail with any of Theſe Monſters yet, either in Pity, or in Rage, to put her to death. When ſhe found her ſelf brought to This Extremity, that ſhe had no Way left her in Nature to keep Body and Soul together (the Gripes of a Tormenting Famine having already ſeiz'd her, and no poſſibility of getting over them) ſhe deliver'd her ſelf-up to Fury and Neceſſity, and pitch'd upon the moſt Unnatural Reſolution that ever was heard of.

She had a Child Sucking at her Breaſt, which ſhe ſnatcht-up; and looking Tenderly upon it, [What, ſays ſhe, *ſhall I ſay now to thee, Thou moſt Unfortunate Infant, to be brought into the World, under a Complication of Three ſuch Dreadful Judgments, as War, Famine, and Rebellion! will give thee thy Life perhaps, but not thy Liberty. Now Famine will prevent Slavery; But for our Preſent Tyrants, thou wilt find Them incomparably Worſe then the Other Two. What canſt thou do Better now, then to ſupply the Want of a Meal's Meat to thy Starving Mother, and hag out the Party with the Horrour of the Fact? And then finally Crown the Hiſtory of the Jews with the Only Execrable Abomination that is yet wanting to the perfecting of their Miſery? With Theſe Words, ſhe kill'd her Child, Boyl'd and Dreſs'd it; the One Half of it ſhe eat Her ſelf; and the Other Half, ſhe ſet by out of the Way, and kept Cover'd. The Faction had it preſently in the Wind; and upon the Smell of the Inhumane Cookery, they came immediately to the Woman's Houſe; with Menaces of Death without Mercy, if ſhe did not forthwith bring them out her Proviſions. The Woman told them that This was all ſhe had, and ſo ſhew'd them the Remainder of her Child. They ſtood like Statues upon the very ſight of it, and ſo fell to trembling, and ran ſtark Mad. Look ye, ſays the Woman, This is really my Son, and This Diſh is of my Dreſſing. I have eaten the One half my ſelf, and pray do you eat the Other. You will not pretend, I hope, to be Nicer then a Woman, or Tenderer then a Mother: But if you make a Conſcience of the Oblation, I have Eaten Part of it already, and you may leave the reſt where you found it. Upon This, they went their way in a quaking Terrour; and with ſome Difficulty, left the Child with the Unhappy Mother: The Only Thing they ever boggled at.

A Mother Dreſſes and Eats the Fleſh of her Own Son.

The Noiſe of This Bloudy Execution was preſently all over the City; and ſuch an Abhorrence for it in General, as if every ſingle Man had had a Part in the Crime. The Dread of the Famine made Men Weary of their Lives, and the Living Envy'd the Dead that were taken away, before the Extravagance came to This Height. The Story was quickly gotten from the Jews to the Romans, where ſome pity'd the People; Others hated them for it: and ſome again gave no Credit to it. Cæſar acquitted himſelf, as in the Preſence of God, that he had done all he could to make the Jews Eaſy and Happy in their Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes: But if they had rather be tearing one another to pieces, then live in Union, who could help it? If they had rather have War then Peace, or Famine then Plenty: Nay, if nothing elſe would ſerve their turn, but the Firing of That very Temple with their Hands, which Titus did all that he could to preſerve, their Own Children were Meat good enough for ſuch Parents: and he was reſolved to Bury their Iniquities in their Ruine, and not to leave a City ſtanding under the Sun, where Mothers Devour'd their Own Children; and the Fathers yet the more Impious of the Two, for keeping-up the War, after ſo man Demonſtrations of God's Terrible Diſpleaſure againſt it. Titus, after this reflecting upon the Incorrigible Hardneſs and Obſtinacy of the Faction, gave them all for Loſt; for if any thing in Nature would have wrought upon them, the Calamities they had ſuffer'd already, might Poſſibly have reclaim'd them.

Cæſar declares himſelf Innocent of the Whole Matter.

This was the Second time that* Jeruſalem was Burnt, upon the ſame Day of the Month.

WHen Two of the Legions had finiſh'd their Platforms, Titus on the Eighth of the Month Lous, Order'd his Rams to be planted againſt the Weſtern-Gallery of the Outward-Temple: having play'd the Beſt piece of Battery he had for Six Whole Days without Intermiſſion; but to no Purpoſe: for the Work was Proof againſt the Engines. There were Others at the ſame time ſapping the Foundations on the North-ſide; and when they found that with an Incredible Labour, they could only looſen ſome of the Outward Stones, without moving any of the reſt; for the Porch ſtood yet Firm, they perceiv'd at laſt that there was no Good to be done by Digging and Mining, or by the Help of Levers and Bars: ſo that the Romans betook themſelves to their Scaling Ladders.

Batteries and Mines carry'd-on for Six Whole Days ſucceſſively, to no Purpoſe.

The Jews could not hinder them from planting their Ladders; but they made a Brave Reſiſtance, where there was any Place for't: Encountering thoſe that got-up, hand to hand, before they could put themſelves upon their Guard; caſting Others down Head-long, as they were Mounting: Cutting-off ſome as they were advancing with with Relief; and ſometimes overturning Ladders, Men and all together. So that the Romans Loſs upon this Encounter was very Conſiderable; eſpecially in the Diſputes they had for the Defending or Recovering of their Colours, as One of the Niceſt Points of Honour among Swordmen. But, in the Concluſion, the Jews kept the Enſigns that they took, and kill'd the Enſign-Bearers; which Terrify'd the reſt, and Forc'd them to a Retreat. Now to give the Beſiegers there Due at laſt, there fell not a Man of them but Dy'd like a Roman. Thoſe of the Faction that had done Bravely in Former Encounters, did ſo ſtill; and ſo did Eleazar, the Nephew of the Tirant Simon: But Titus finding by this time, that, in ſparing a ſtrange Temple, he did but Sacrifice his own Men, he gave Order to his People forthwith to ſet Fire to the Gates.

The Romans Order'd to ſet Fire to the Gates.

Upon this Occaſion, there came over to him, Aňanus of Emmaus, one of Simon's Guards, and the moſt Inhumane Wretch he had about him; with Archelaus, the Son of Magadathes: who flatter'd Themſelves with the Hope of Better Quarter for leaving the Faction upon a Winning Hand. Titus was ſo well Enformed of the Barbarous Practices and Characters of theſe Pretended Converts, that he was once in the mind to have cut-off both their Heads; this Pretence notwithſtanding: being fully Convinc'd, that it was pure Neceſſity and Deſign, not Affection or Good Will that brought them over. Neither did he take them to have deſerv'd their Lives for that Service, that firſt ſet their Country in a Flame, and then abondon'd it. But however, upon ſecond Thoughts, he overcame the Provocation; and ſo forgave them, though with a Reſolution never to truſt them.

Two Treacherous Deſerters go over to Titus.

The Gates were by this time in a Blaze; the Silver-work over them Melted, and the Timbers all in a Flame; inſomuch that the Fire was gotten to the next Galleries. This was ſuch a Surprize to the Jews to find themſelves wrapt-up in Flames, that they ſtood gaping one upon another in an Aſtoniſhment, without ſo much as Attempting any thing toward their Relief; or Concerning themſelves, either for what was already Conſum'd, or for the Saving of the reſt. They had, in ſhort, neither Heart nor Strength left them, and the Fire got Ground all that Day, and the Night following, till by little and little it burnt down the Galleries.

The Jews wrapt-up in Flames.

The Galleries burnt to the Ground

Titus gave Order next Day for the Quenching of the Fire, and the Levelling of the Ways for the March of his Army. After this, he call'd a Council of his General Officers: That is to ſay, Tiberius Alexander, his Lieutenant General; Sextus Cerealis, the Commander of the Fifth Legion; Lorgius Lepidus, of the Tenth; Titus Trygius, of the Fifteenth; and there were with Theſe, (a) Æternius Fronto, the Captain of the Two Alexandrian Legions; and Marcus Antonius Julianus, the Governour of Judæa: with Colonels, and other Officers, to adviſe withall what Meaſures to take in the Buſineſs of the Temple. Some were for keeping up to the Strictneſs of the Law of Arms; for ſo long as That Temple ſtood, and the Numerous Meetings there Continu'd, the Jews (they ſaid) would never be quiet: Others were for the Saving of the Temple, upon Condition of the Jews quitting it; and that there might be no further Quarrel about it: but if it ſhould be gotten by the Sword, by all means to Burn it; not as a Temple, but as a Caſtle: for in that Caſe, the Fault would be Their's that forc'd the Burning of it; not Theirs that did it by Neceſſity. But, ſays Titus (interpoſing here) if the Jews will be Obſtinate, and turn a Temple into a Citadel, ſhall I Revenge the Stubborneſs of a Rebellious People upon Stocks and Stones, and lay the moſt Glorious Fabrick of the Univerſe in Aſhes for their Sakes? It would be an Affront to the Dignity of Rome it ſelf, to think of depriving the Empire of ſo Illuſtrious an Ornament. When Fronto Alexander, and Cerealis found what Titus would be at, they came over to His Opinion, and ſo the Council was diſmiſs'd; with Orders to the Army to reſt and refreſh themſelves, to be the fitter for Action: Several choice Battalions being Commanded out in the mean time to look after the Fire, and cut out Ways over the Ruines. The Jews being now hareſs'd off their Legs and Courage, were quiet enough for this Day: but the Day following, when they had gather'd Strength, and taken Heart again, they made a Deſperate Sally about the 2d Hour of the Day through the Eaſtern Gate, upon the Guards of the Outward Temple. The Romans ſtood the Firſt Shock, like a Wall againſt them, under the Pover of their Bucklers, with a Mighty Reſolution: but that would not have laſted long againſt ſuch an Odds of Fierceneſs and Numbers, if Cæſar, with a Select Body of Horſe (who ſaw the Action from Antonia) had not come ſeaſonably up to their Relief, before they gave Ground. The Jews ſhrunk, upon this Charge; and the Romans breaking-in upon the Front, the reſt betook themſelves to Flight: and then the Romans drawing-off in their Courſe, the Jews rally'd and came-on again. At this rate they took their turns interchangably, one after another, for a Better or a Worse, till about the Fifth Hour of the Day; when the Jews were forc'd into the Temple, and shut-up there. Titus, upon this, withdrew to Antonia, with a Resolution to Attaque the Temple with his whole Army the next Morning. But God in his Providence had from all Eternity doom'd it to the Fire; and in Course of Time, the Fatal Day was now at hand: the Tenth of the Month Lous, and the very same Day whereupon it was formerly burnt by Nebucadnezer, the King of Babylon. But this was a Conflagration which the Jews brought upon Themselves; for Titus had no sooner left them in quiet, but the Rebels made a Sally upon Cesar's Gards as they were at Work, by his Order, ot extinguish the Fire: who put the Jews to the Rout upon it, and had the Pursuit of them to the Temple.

CHAP. X.

A Soldier pretends a Divine Impulse, and sets Fire to the Temple. Titus endeavours to stop it. A Dreadful Massacre.

THere was at this time a certain Soldier, that without any Pretence of Authority, or Conscience for so Impious a Fact, took upon him to Act by the Inspiration of a Divine Impulse. He mounted the Shoulders of One of his Comerades; and then cast a Flaming Brand into the Golden Window that looks toward the Apartments on the North-side of the Temple. The Place took Fire immediately, which raised such a Hideous Outcry among the Jews, that they hasten'd all that was possible to their Relief. For this was not a time, by sparing of their Lives, or their Persons, when they had left the only thing that had made Life Precious to them. The News of This Conflagration being brought to Titus, just as he was laying himself down in his Tent to take a little Rest after the Fatigne of the Combat, he leapt-up; and immediately taking his Chariot, passed away with it to the Temple, to try what he could do toward the putting-out of the Fire. His Great Officers follow'd him; and the Legions after Them, in such a Confusion, as is but Natural to a Prodigious Multitude without Discipline. Cæsar did all that was to be done, with Words and Signs, toward the Stopping of it; but it was all as good as Nothing, for the Greater Noise drown'd the Less; and they were every jot as Blind to the Signs and Motions of his Hand, as they were Deaf to what he said. Neither were the Soldiers governed by Menaces or Commands; but only follow'd the Dictates of Rage and Passion: Some were trampled upon, and squeez'd to death in Crouds; Others choak'd in the Sultry Ruines of the Galleries over the Porches; and the same thing, whether they Overcame, or were Overcome. The Common Soldiers in the Temple pretended, in Excuse of their Disobedience, that they could not hear their Emperour's Orders; and they that follow'd, gave the Word forward to Throw Fire. The Rebels, in fine, had no way in the World to prevent it; and which way soever they turn'd themselves, they saw nothing but Bloud and Destruction. As for the Poor People, the Sickly, and the Unarm'd, they put them to the Sword wherever they found them: Mountains of Dead Bodies pil'd-up about the Altar, and Streams of Bloud flowing down the Stairs; with Numbers of Miserable Creatures weltering in their own Gore.

A Soldier sets Fire to the Temple, under pretext of a Divine Impulse.

Titus does all he can to stop it, but to no Purpose.

A Dreadful Massacre, and Confusion.

When Titus saw there was no restraining the Fury of his Soldiers, and that the Fire gain'd every Day more and more upon him, he took some of his Chief Officers along with him into the Inward Temple; where, upon a Strict Examination of Matters, he found the Glory and Magnificence of the Place, even beyond the very Fame of it; or at least Equal to the Report of the Jews themselves. But Titus observing, that the Fire had not as yet taken the Sanctuary; and making a True Judgment upon it, that it might not be yet too Late to save the Holy Place: He started up, and in his Own Person earnestly besought his Soldiers to do their Uttermost to put a Stop to the Fire; giving it in Charge also to Liberalis, a Centurion of his Guards, to press the Doing of it, and to Cudgel those that refus'd. But what with an Ungovernable Rage, and an Impotent Fondness for War, neither Fear nor Respect was sufficient to keep them within the Compass of their Duty. There were Others again, that had their Hearts set upon the Booty; not doubting, but where the Doors were Plated with Gold, they should find the Inside all fill'd with Hidden Treasure. While Cæsar was so very Intent upon the Saving of the Temple, One of the Soldiers at the same time set Fire to some of the Door-Posts; whereupon Titus and his Captains were forc'd to withdraw out of distance of perventing the Mischief: so that the

the Temple was deſtroy'd at laſt, in diſpite of whatever Titus could do to hinder it.

This Deſolation was a Calamity to make a Body's Heart bleed: the Ruine of the moſt Wonderful Fabrick that ever was ſeen or heard of, both for Structure, Bulk, State, Magnificence, the Honour of Religion and of Holy Things. But we have This for our Comfort and Inſtruction yet, that there is an Uncontrollable Fatality attends all the Works of the Creation, whether Animate, or Inanimate; and that all things muſt have their Period. It is a moſt Remarkable Revolution alſo, that This Second Conflagration ſhould ſo exactly anſwer the very Day and Month of the Former, under Nebuchadnezer, as is ſaid already. We reckon from the Beginning of the Firſt Temple by Solomon, to the Deſtruction of This in the Second Year of Veſpaſian, Eleven Hundred and Thirty Years, Seven Months, and Fifteen Days: and from That of Haggai, in the Second of Cyrus, we account Six Hundred Thirty Nine Years, and Forty Five Days.

CHAP. XI.

A Cruelty that ſpares neither Age, Sex, nor Quality. Nothing to be ſeen but Fire and Bloud. Several Prieſts Engaged in the Quarrel. The Temple Conſum'd to Aſhes, and all that was in it. Six Thouſand Poor People Deſtroy'd upon the Credit of Enthuſiaſts.

WHEN the Temple was now in a Flame, the Soldiers took all that came to hand, and kill'd all they met, to the degree of a moſt Prodigious Slaughter and Pillage: without any Reſpect either to Age or Sex; but Young and Old, Sacred and Prophane, Prieſts and Laiques, they all went together, and Men of all Sorts and Qualities were equally involv'd in the Common Calamities of the War: and whether they Reſiſted, or Submitted; whether they ſtood it out, or begg'd Quarter, they far'd all alike. As the Fire advanced, the Crackling of the Flames was heard in Company with the Dying Groans of People at their Laſt Gaſp; and betwixt the Depth of the Hill, and the Extent of the Conflagration, the Whole City ſeem'd to be but one Continu'd Blaze. The Tumult and Uproar was ſo Dreadful, that it is not poſſible to imagine any Thing more Terrible: what with the Raging Outcries of the Roman Legions; the Howling of the Rebels when they found themſelves at the Mercy of Fire and Sword; and the Diſmal Lamentations of Diſtreſſed Wretches in the Temple, betwixt the Enemy, and the Fire. In fine, Thoſe upon the Mountain, and thoſe in the City, anſwering one another by turns: the Flames Opening the Eyes of thoſe that the Famine had well nigh Clos'd, and inſpiring Freſh Spirit and Abillity to deplore their Misfortunes. The Neighbouring Mountains and Places beyond Jordan, Ecchoing the ſame Complaints and Grievances over and over again; and the Calamity, in Weight, and Subſtance, yet more then the Noiſe. The Flaſhes were ſo Impetuous and Violent, that the very Mountain the Temple ſtood upon, look'd as if it had been One Body of Fire from the Bottom; and the Bloud, in proportion, Anſwerable to the Flame; for the Number of the Slain was ſuperior to that of thoſe that did the Execution. The Ground was cover'd all over with Carcaſſes, and the Soldiers purſu'd the Living over the Bodies of the Dead: but in the end, a band of Ruffians beat back the Romans; and having forced their way into the Outward Temple, made their Eſcape into the City, and the reſt of the Multitude got into the Outward Porch.

An Outrageous Cruelty, that ſpares neither Age, Sex, or Quality.

Nothing to be ſeen but Fire and Bloud.

There were a great many Prieſts engag'd in This Quarrel with the Romans, that made uſe of their Temple-Spits inſtead of Darts, and of their Seats with Lead in them, that did them the Office of Stones: but when they ſaw that This would do no Good, and that the Fire found them out ſtill wherever they were, they Cover'd themſelves for a while under a Thick Wall of a matter of Eight Cubits over. Two of the Principal Men of This Number, (Meirus the Son of Belgas, and Joſeph the Son of Dalæus) that might have ſav'd themſelves by going over to the Romans, choſe rather to Stand or Fall with their Companions, and ſo plunging themſelves into the Flames, ran the ſame Fate with the Temple.

Several Prieſts engag'd in the Quarrel.

When the Romans found the Temple it ſelf laid in Aſhes, they did not think it worth their while to trouble their Heads about any of the reſt of the Buildings, and ſo put Fire to all at once; as the Gates, and the Galeries, &c. ſave only One on the Eaſt-ſide, and Another on the South: And Theſe likewiſe, not long after, follow'd the Fortune of the reſt. They burnt alſo the Treaſury, and the Wardrobe, with Jewels, Mony, and Mony's Worth in it, and Rich Habits to an Incredible Valu e.

The Temple, and all that was Pretious in it, laid in Aſhes.

In one Word, This Place was the Depoſitory of all the Jews had that was Pretious.

6000 poor People deſtroy'd by the Advice of Enthuſiaſts.

There were now gotten together into One Gallery without the Templethat was yet ſtanding, in Women, Children, and a Mixt Multitude that fled from the Rabble, to the Number of near Six Thouſand Perſons. But before Cæſar could give any Order or Direction in the Caſe, the Soldiers, in an Extravagant Brutal Fury, ſet the Place on Fire; and ply'd it ſo Cloſe, that betwixt Thoſe that were burnt to Death, and Others that caſt themſelves head-long down the Ruines to ſave themſelves, there was not One Soul came off Alive.

The Occaſion of This Miſchief was a certain Impoſtor, who took upon him to deliver a Meſſage from Almighty God, That Day, to the People, and to This Effect. He Commanded them in the Name of God to go immediately up to the Temple, with an Aſſurance, that they ſhould there receive an Infallible Proof of his Divine Favour and Protection. This was a Common Practice of the Faction to pretend Revelations to keep the Credulous Multitude Firm againſt all Dangers, and to ſecure them from Deſerting. But Men in Adverſity are apt to hope the Beſt, eſpecially where they are Promis'd Relief; though it be but upon the Credit of a Falſe Prophet.

CHAP. XII.

More Credit given to Falſe Oracles then to the Truth it ſelf. A Comet in the Figure of a Sword. A Strange Light about the Altar. A Cow brings forth a Lamb. A Brazen Gate opens of it ſelf. Chariots and Armed Men ſeen in the Air. Fore-boding Exclamations from a Poor Country Creature. He is firſt puniſhed for it, and then Diſcharged as a Mad-man. In the Concluſion, he foretells his own Deſtruction. A Prophecy of an Emperour to come out of Judæa Expounded of Veſpaſian.

We give more heed to Falſe Oracles then to Truth it ſelf.

HOW Eaſily were Theſe Superſtitious Wretches ſeduced into a Belief of Falſe Oracles, Counterfeits, and Impoſtors! But when they were at any time premoniſh'd from the Lips of Truth it ſelf, by Prodigies, and other Monitory Prognoſticks of their Approaching Ruine, they had neither Eyes, Ears, nor Underſtanding to make a Right Uſe or Application of them: but paſs'd them over without either Heeding, or ſo much as thinking of them. As for Example now,

A Prodigious Comet in the Figure of a Sword.

What ſhall we ſay to the Comet that hung over Jeruſalem for one whole Year together, in the Figure of a Sword?

A Wonderful Light about the Altar.

What ſhall we think again of that Wonderful Light that was ſeen about the Altar, a little before the Revolt, on the 8th of the Month Xanthicus, at the Ninth Hour of the Night, upon the Celebration of the Paſchal Feaſt, and continu'd for the Space of Half an Hour as bright as Day. This Prodigy was look'd upon by the Ignorant as a good Omen; but it was expounded by thoſe that knew better things, as the Forerunner of a War; and the Miſtery unfolded before it came to paſs.

A Cow that brought forth a Lamb.

At the ſame Feſtival, there was Another Prodigy of a Cow deliver'd of a Lamb in the middle of the Temple, as they were leading her up to the Altar for a Sacrifice.

A Brazen Gate Opening of it ſelf.

The Eaſtern Gate of the Inner Temple was made of Solid Braſs; and ſo very heavy, that it was as much as Twenty Men could do every Night to ſhut it: beſides that it was faſt'ned with Iron-bolts and Bars, Mortiſs'd into a Huge Threſhold of one Entire Stone. This Gate, about the Sixth Hour of the Night, Open'd of it ſelf; and upon early Notice given of it to the Proper Officer, he came immediately up to look after it, and had much ado to make it faſt again. Some Ignorant People there were that took This for another Good Omen; deſcanting upon it, that it was a Gate of Bleſſings ſet open to them by Providence: But the Wiſer Sort made a Contrary Judgment of it; and that the Opening of the Gate was in Favour of the Enemy, and foretold Deſolation to the City.

Chariots, and Armed Men ſeen in the Air.

Some ſhort time after the Feſtival was over, (on the 21ſt of the Month Artemiſius) there appeared a Prodigy of a Viſion ſo Extraordinary, that I ſhould hardly venture to report it, if I could not produce ſeveral Eye-Witneſſes that are yet living to Confirm the Truth of it; and if the Calamities that were foretold, had not come to paſs. There were ſeen up and down in the Air, before Sun-ſet, Chariots and Armed Men, all over the Country, paſſing along with the Clouds round about the City.

Upon

Upon the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, as the Prieſts were a going to Officiate in the Inner-Temple according to Cuſtom, they heard at firſt a kind of a Confuſed Murmur; and after That, a Voice calling out Earneſtly in Articulate Words, Let us be gone, Let us be gone.

A Voice crying in the Air, Let us be gone.

But I come now to a Story that paſſes all the reſt. A matter of Four Years before the War, when the City was in a Profound Peace, and flowing in Plenty, there was one Jeſus the Son of Ananus, a Plain Country-Fellow, who coming to the Feaſt of Tabernacles, (an Annual Feaſt to the Honour of God) brake out on a ſudden into This Exclamation over and over. [A Voice from the Eaſt; a Voice from the Weſt; a Voice from the Four Quarters of the World; a Voice to Jeruſalem, and a Voice to the Temple: a Voice to New Marry'd Men and Women, and a Voice to This Whole Nation.] This was his Cry Day and Night, from Place to Place, thorough Every Street of the City. Some Great Men in the Government took ſuch Offence at ſo Ill-boding a Liberty, that they Order'd the Man to be taken-up and ſeverely whipt. He took the Puniſhment without returning ſo much as One Word, either by the By, or in his Own Defence, or to Complain of Hard Meaſure; but ſtill he went on and on with the ſame Things over again, Calling and Denouncing as before. The Magiſtrates began now to ſuſpect (as they had Reaſon for it) ſomewhat of a Divine Impulſe in what he ſaid; and that he ſpake by an Extraordinary Spirit. He was carry'd, upon This, to Albinus the Governour of Judæa; who caus'd him to be laſh'd to the very Bones, which he took without either Tears or Supplication: only in a Mournful Voice, as well as he could, he follow'd Every Stroke, with a [Woe, woe to Jeruſalem!] Albinus, as his Judge, fell then to asking him what he was, whence he came, where he was Born, and what he meant by That way of Proceeding? But he gave him no Anſwer. This was his Way all along, till Albinus was fain to Diſcharge him at laſt as a Mad Man. From That Time to the Beginning of the War, he was never known to Viſit or Speak to any of the Citizens; or to make uſe of any Other then That Doleful Form of Words [Woe, woe to Jeruſalem!] He never gave an Ill Word to Thoſe that daily Scourg'd him, or a Good One even to Thoſe that fed him: But his Anſwer was to all People alike, an Ominous Preſage. He was Obſerv'd to be ſtill more Clamorous upon Feſtivals, then upon Other Days; and at this rate he went on for Seven Years and Five Months; and neither his Voice nor his Strength failing him, till the Siege of Jeruſalem Verify'd his Predictions. After This, he took the Tour of the Wall once again, crying out (with a Stronger Voice then Ordinary) [Woe, woe to This City, This Temple, and This People!] Concluding at laſt with a [Woe, woe be to me my ſelf!] And in This Inſtant he was taken-off with a Stone from an Engine in the middle of all his Fore-bodings.

The Man puniſhed, but ſtill continues his Out-cry.

He is Diſcharged at laſt as a Mad-man.

Fore-boding alſo in the End his own Deſtruction.

Here is enough ſaid to Convince and Satisfy Mankind that our Deſtruction is from our ſelves, and that Providence is wanting in Nothing to us, that may Conduce to the Common Good and Benefit of Reaſonable Nature: as well by the Means of Foreſight, and Revelation, as by the Aid and Faculty of Reaſon. But when we are precaution'd of Future Events, and will take no Warning, Our Ruine lies at Our Own Door. How came the Jews, after the Taking of Antonia, to make the Temple Square, when they were Conſcious to Themſelves of a Prediction in Holy Writ, that Temple and City ſhould be Both Taken, whenever it ſhould be reduc'd to That Figure. But the Chief Motive to This Unfortunate War, was the Ambiguity of Another Text, importing that in Thoſe Days there ſhould One come out of Judæa that ſhould have the Command of the Whole World. Now They apply'd This to their Own Nation, and Many Great Men fell into the ſame Error: but This Prophecy, in truth, was intended of Veſpaſian; who was Created Emperour in Judæa. But Interpretations go by Phancy; ſome One Way: ſome, Another: and ſo it far'd with the Jews, till they came in the End to pay for their Miſtakes with the Irreparable Deſtruction of Themſelves, and of their Country.

The Prophecy of an Emperour to come out of Judæa, Expounded of Veſpaſian.

CHAP. XIII.

Titus Proclaim'd Emperour. The Force of Hunger and Drought in Extremity. Certain Prieſts Order'd to be put to Death. The Faction deſires a Treaty, and Titus Agrees to it. A Pertinent Diſcourſe upon the Subject. Titus Offers them Terms, which they Refuſe, under Pretence of an Oath to the contrary. Titus Orders upon This that no Jew ſhall have either Protection or Quarter. The Romans fall on with Fire and Sword; but Titus continues Tender and Good Natur'd to the Laſt.

THE Rebels being now fled into the City; the Temple, and every thing about it ſtill in a Blaze, the Romans lodg'd their Enſigns againſt the Eaſtern Gate; where they Offer'd Sacrifice; and with Great Shouts and Acclamations, Proclaim'd Titus Emperour. They got ſo Prodigious a Booty, that Gold in Syria was brought down upon it to Half the Price.

Titus Proclaim'd Emperour by the Army.

Gold ſunk to Half the Value.

The Force of Drought and Famine.

There was a Child among the Prieſts, upon the Wall, that begg'd of the Roman Guards only a Soup of Drink to quench his Thirſt: which they freely gave him, out of a Tenderneſs both to his Age, and to his Neceſſity, upon Promiſes of Good Faith on Both Sides. The Child went down and Drank, and then fill'd a Flagon that he carry'd along with him, and made ſuch Haſt back with it to his Friends, that the Guards could not Overtake him. The Romans charg'd the Boy with Breach of Articles; but he pleaded for Himſelf, that he Covenanted only for Liberty to fetch the Water, not to Continue with them when he had it; and Conſequently had broken no Conditions. They found the Fraud ſo Innocent, that they were well enough Content to be ſo Couzen'd.

When the Prieſts had ſtay'd Five Days longer upon the Wall, they were forc'd to come down, and deliver-up themſelves by the Extreme Neceſſity of an Outrageous Hunger. The Guards took them to Titus, where they caſt themſelves at his Feet for Mercy. But his Anſwer was, They ſhould have thought of That ſooner: for now the Temple was gone, it was but Reaſonable the Prieſts ſhould go too; and that They and their Temple ſhould be Inſeparable. Upon This, Titus order'd the Prieſts to be put to death.

Titus Orders Certain Prieſts to be put to Death.

The Faction Deſperate, and deſire a Treaty.

Titus Entertains the Motion;

The Heads of the Faction finding themſelves preſs'd at all Hands, and ſo ſurrounded that it was impoſſible to come-off, they propos'd a Conference with Cæſar; who, out of his Natural Generoſity and Goodneſs, inclin'd to Entertain it, partly out of a Deſire to ſave the Town, and partly at the Inſtance of his Friends, in Hope that the Rebels might be brought to Better Terms for the Future. Titus made a Stand at the Weſt-ſide of the Inner-Temple near the Gates that lead into the Gallery; and there was a Bridge of Communication betwixt the Temple and the Upper-Town; which at this time parted the Romans and the Jews. The Soldiers gather'd together on Both Sides, about their Generals: The Jews, on the One hand, to learn what Hope of Pardon; and the Romans, on the Other, out of Curioſity to ſee how Titus would receive them: who in the Firſt place Commanded Peace and Silence, and that his Men ſhould forbear Shouting; after which he deliver'd his Mind to them, by an Interpreter; giving thereby to Underſtand that he had a Right to Speak Firſt.

And Treats the Soldiers with a Pertinent Diſcourſe upon the Subject.

And is not your Country Miſerable enough yet, do ye think, Good People? (ſays he) Will you never be brought to a Senſe either of your Own Weakneſs, or of the Roman Power; but like ſo many Beaſts and Mad-men, Ruine your People, City and Temple All in One: and your ſelves too moſt deſervedly, in the Concluſion? When were you ever out of Broils and Tumults, ſince Pompey laid Your City in Rubbiſh? And nothing will ſerve you now but Open War againſt the Romans. Is it your Numbers you depend upon? Why you have ſeen, ſays he, that the One Half of our Army have been able to deal with you. Or do you Value your ſelves upon the Faith of your Auxiliaries and Allies? Where is That People under the Sun that is not More or Leſs in Our Allegeance? Or that would not rather have the Romans to Friend, then the Jews? If you reckon upon the Strength of your Bodies, take notice that the Germans are our Subjects. And ſo for the Firmneſs of your Walls: Are they Stronger then the Brittains Wall, the Ocean? and yet Thoſe People, with That Fence, have not been able to withſtand us. Or if you rely upon the Addreſs and Reſolution of your Leaders, we have been too Hard you know for the Carthaginians Themſelves. But it is the Humanity of the Romans, that hath rais'd-up Enemies to Themſelves: Firſt, in giving you Lands in Poſſeſſion; and then in Erecting Kings out of your Own Tribes to Govern them. We have alſo granted you the Freedom and Exerciſe of your Country's Laws, and permitted you to live both at Home and Abroad according to your Own Liking. And, which is more then all the reſt, we have allow'd you the Privileges of Collecting, Receiving, and Employing ploying Contributions and Tributes for the Maintenance of your Religion and God's Holy Worſhip; with all Freedom to your ſelves and your Friends. And what's the Uſe you have made of all Theſe Graces and Benefits, but to Enrich your ſelves into a Capacity of doing Us the more Miſchief in the Employing of our Own Money againſt Our ſelves. You do, in truth, behave your ſelves like the Worſt of Serpents, that practice upon the Lives of Thoſe that take them into their Boſoms.

It is agreed that the Contempt you had for the Spiritleſs Heavineſs of Nero, made you forget the Quiet that at the ſame time you Enjoy'd, and put you upon Ambitious and Extravagant Deſigns.

My Father, you muſt know, did not come into Judæa to call you to an Account for your Defection from Ceſtius; but rather to Reform you by Admonition, and Good Advice. If the Depopulating of This Nation had been his Bus'neſs, he would have ſtruck at the Root, and begun with Jeruſalem, rather then Gallilee, and Thoſe Parts thereabouts; which he did on purpoſe to give you Room and Leiſure to Repent. But This Good Nature of His paſs'd for Weakneſs, and Our Lenity hath given you a Boldneſs that you take for Courage.

After the Death of Nero, according to the Cuſtom of Other Wicked Men, you made Advantage of our Diviſions; and my Father and my ſelf were no ſooner gone to Ægypt, but you took the Opportunity of our being out of the Way, to lay the Foundation of a War againſt us: and notwithſtanding all the Proofs we have given you of our Tenderneſs, and Humanity, in the Government of Thoſe Provinces; You had yet the Face to Enter into Practices againſt us, even when my Father was already declar'd Emperour, and My ſelf Cæſar. Nay, and it went further yet: For after the very Eſtabliſhment of us by Common Conſent, in the Quiet and Peaceable Poſſeſſion of the Empire; and the Gratulatory Complements that were pay'd us by Forreign Miniſters, upon our Acceſſion to the Government, who but the Jews to be ſtill our Enemies! As appeared by their Diſpatches of Embaſſies and Deputations as far as beyond Euphrates, for Aſſiſtance in their Revolt. To ſay nothing of your New Fortifications, Factions, and Competitions, till it came in the End to a Civil War: an Ingratitude that none but the Wickedeſt of Men could have been Guilty of.

When my Father ſent me (though with Great Difficulty and Reluctance) to call This Stubborn Rebellious City to an Account, How did I pleaſe my ſelf to hear that the People were well-diſpoſed towards a Peace! How did I beg of you to prevent a War before a Blow was ſtruck! Can you ſay that I did not make it as Eaſie to you afterwards as I could? Did I ever refuſe any Man of you that Offer'd himſelf? Did I ever break Faith with any Man that came over to me? How Tender was I of your Priſoners! Or was I ever Hard upon any Man that did not Enflame the Quarrel? With what Unwillingneſs did I come to the Battering of your Walls! And ſo I kept-off all Bloudy Executions from you, as much as poſſible. When did I ever get the Better of you, and not ſue for Peace, as if you your ſelves had been the Conquerours? Whenever I came near your Temple, I took no Advantage of the Right I had by the Law of Arms to the Deſtroying of it: but only made it my Requeſt to you to ſpare your ſelves, and all that was Holy that belong'd to you. Did I not offer you free Leave to depart; and upon Terms of Security too? Or if Nothing but Fighting would ſerve your Turn, I gave you the Choice of your Own Time and Place: and what's the Fruit now of all This Tenderneſs, but the Burning of the Temple with your Own Hands, that I would ſo fain have Preſerv'd? And have you the Impudence now at laſt to invite me to a Parly, as if you had any thing left you to attone for what you have deſtroy'd? How can you expect a Pardon for your ſelves, that would not ſo much as Pardon your Own Temple? And here you preſent your ſelves in Arms too, without ſo much as pretending to be Supplicants. But to come now to the Ground of This Miſerable Confidence. Your People have neither Heart nor Soul left them; your Temple's gone; the City mine, and your ſelves all at my Mercy: and yet you would be thought to inſiſt upon Terms of Honour now at laſt. But not to ſtand Expoſtulating any longer with your Pertinacious Follies, lay down your Arms, and render your ſelves, and I am yet Content to give you your Lives: and when I have Once done Neceſſary Juſtice upon the Main, you ſhall find Me a Gentle-Maſter as to the Reſt. The Faction return'd him This Anſwer, That they could not deliver themſelves up, upon any Promiſe, or Aſſurance he could give them, becauſe they were under an Oath to the Contrary: but that they were Ready to be gone, if he pleas'd, with their Wives and Children, into the Deſart; and leave the Town to the Romans. Titus took it ſo very Heinouſly to ſee Priſoners giving Law, and Impoſing Conditions upon the Conquerours, that he preſently cauſed Proclamation to be made, That no Jew ſhould preſume for the Future to make any Further Application to Titus, or Expect either Protection, or Quarter: but that they might now defend themſelves by Arms as well as they could; for Cæſar was Reſolv'd to govern himſelf by the Rules of War: ſo the Soldiers had leave given them to fall-on with Fire and Sword, and make their Beſt of the Spoil of the City. There was was nothing done That Day; but the Next Morning they ſet Fire to the Regiſter-Office; the Caſtle, the Council-Chamber, and a Place call'd Ophlas: and ſo the Fire went-on to Queen Helen's Palace in the Middle of the Mount, carrying all before it, together with the Dead Bodies, whereof the Houſes and Streets were Crouding Full.

Titus Tender and Good Natur'd to the Laſt.

On the ſame Day, the Sons and Brethren of King Izates, with ſeveral other Perſons of Honour, join'd in a Petition to Cæſar for their Lives; who, according to his Uſual Practice, granted the Petition, though very much incens'd againſt the Party. But they were all Order'd to Priſon, and the Sons and near Relations of Izates carry'd afterwards Bound to Rome for Hoſtages,

CHAP. XIV.

The Faction moves to the Palace-Royal, where they cut-off 8400 Perſons, and ſeize all the Treaſure. A Nice Point of Roman Honour. Joſeph gives Good Advice, but it is Loſt upon them. Sinks and Vaults are ſearched for Deſerters; and they Kill all they take. No Death ſo Ghaſtly as That of a Famine. The Laſt Hope of the Faction is in their Hiding-holes.

The Faction Moves to the Palace-Royal, a Place of Great Strength. They cut off 8400 Perſons there, and ſeize all the Treaſure.

THE Rebels ſteer'd their Courſe next to the King's Houſe, a Strong and a Safe Place, with a Great Treaſure laid-up in it. The Jews beat the Romans out of the Houſe; kill'd to the Number of Eight Thouſand Four Hundred Perſons there, and carry'd-off all the Money. Upon This Encounter, there were Two Roman Soldiers taken Alive; a Horſe-man, and a Foot-man: The Latter was kill'd, and dragg'd along the Streets quite thorough the Town, as if it had been to revenge the Whole Nation upon That Single Body. The Horſe-man, upon a Pretence that he had ſomewhat of Moment to Communicate, was carry'd to Simon: and having nothing to ſay when he came There, Order was given to Ardalas, one of Simon's Officers to have him put to death. So he was preſently taken out with his Hands bound behind him, and a Swathing-band over his Eyes, to have his Head cut-off within Sight of the Romans; but as the Executioner was drawing his Sword to do his Office, the Priſoner ſtarted away, and made his Eſcape over to the Romans. Titus would not ſuffer him to be put to death only for giving the Enemy the ſlip; but look'd upon it as ſuch an Indignity to have a Roman Soldier taken Alive, that he was Diſarm'd and Caſhier'd upon it; which to a Man of Honour is Worſe then Death.

A Roman Point of Honour.

It being the Romans Fortune the Next Day to Rout the Jews out of the Lower-City, they put all in a Blaze as far as Siloah; and had the Pleaſure of ſeeing what Havock the Conflagration made, but the Booty was gone: for the Ruffians had diſpos'd of That already into the Upper-Town. Now they were not a People to repent of any Miſchief they had ever done; and they kept up their Arrogance in the Worſt of Fortunes. The burning of the City was to Them a Spectacle of Joy; and they declar'd that, as Matters ſtood at That time, they were ready to Welcome Death it ſelf with Comfort: for now the People were waſted, and almoſt totally cut-off; the Temple burnt to Aſhes, and the Town all in a Flame, there was nothing left for the Romans that were to come after them, to Joy in.

The Jews Obſtinate in their Wickedneſs. The Conflagration ſerves them but for a Spectacle.

But while Things were at This paſs, Joſeph did all that was to be done to ſave the Miſerable Remains of a Ruin'd and a Deſolated City; dividing himſelf in his Applications, betwixt Invectives againſt the Impious Inhumanities of the One ſide, and Seaſonable Encouragements and Good Councells to the Other: But it was all to no purpoſe; for the Jews were both ty'd-up by their Oath, and as good as Beſieg'd by the Overpow'ring Number of the Romans; beſide, that their Swords were wonted to Blood and Slaughter.

Joſeph gives good Advice to little Purpoſe.

In This Diſtraction, they ſcatter'd themſelves all over the City; hunting, and watching up and down in the Ruines, Vaults, and Elſewhere, for Deſerters. They took a great many of them, and they kill'd all they took; for they were too Weak to run for't, and their Dead they caſt to the Dogs: But of all Deaths, Famine was the moſt Frightful and Ghaſtly. There were ſeveral that went over to the Romans, without either the Hope, or the Deſire of any other Mercy from them, then what they promis'd themſelves in the Exchange of One Death for Another: and This was the Caſe with the Seditious alſo upon the ſame Account. The Streets were Cover'd with Dead Bodies from One End of the City to the Other; which were either Murder'd, or Starv'd.

Sinks and Vaults are Searched for Deſerters. And they Kill all they take. No Death ſo Ghaſtly as that of Famine.

The

The Laſt Hope of the Tyrannical Faction, was in the Receſſes of Sinks and Privies, upon a Vain Phancy that they might lie Conceal'd there till all ſhould be Over, and the Romans gone; and that Then they might make their Eſcape; not Conſidering that Holes and Hiding-Places are no Proof againſt the All-ſeeing Eye of Juſtice. The Jews that were poſſeſs'd of Theſe Subterranean Retreats, did more Miſchief then the Romans by the Fire; Killing, and Robbing all they could meet that came for Sanctuary to Thoſe Caverns: and let their Food be never ſo Coarſe, or Foul, ſuch was their Neceſſity, that it became a Cauſe of Quarrel: inſomuch that I verily believe, if the Siege had Continu'd, the Living would have been Inhumane enough to Eat the Fleſh of the Dead.

The Laſt Hope of the Faction is in their Hiding Holes.

CHAP. XV.

The Upper Town not to be taken without New Mounts. Titus ſets the Project a-foot. The Idumæans offer him their Service by their Deputies; and beg his Pardon. Titus grants them their Requeſt, but Simon *immediately puts the Deputies to Death. THE Upper-Town was ſeated upon ſuch Crags and Precipices, that Titus found it utterly Impoſſible to gain it without New Mounts: ſo that upon the Twentieth of the Month Lous, he went in hand with the Project. Carriage was Extremely Dear and Troubleſome; (as I have ſaid Elſewhere) for the Materials were all cut down for the Former Works, within a Hundred Furlongs of the Town. The Four Legions threw up a Mount on the Weſt ſide of the Town over againſt the Palace Royal: The Auxiliaries and the reſt caſt-up Another toward the Gallery and the Bridge; and a Fort that Simon built in his War with John, known by the Name of Simon's Tower. At the ſame time the Idumæan Officers laid their Heads together among themſelves how to deſert, and get over to the Romans, and ſent Five Deputies with a Tender of their Service to Titus, and a Submiſſive Petition for Mercy in the Name of the reſt. This was ſomewhat with the Lateſt; but Titus however, upon an Opinion that Simon and John would never ſtand it out, after ſuch a Deſertion, ſent the Deputies back with a Promiſe of their Lives; for he look'd upon the Idumæans as the moſt Conſiderable Part of their Army. This Plot, it ſeems, had taken Air, and Simon cauſed the Five Deputies immediately to be put to Death, and their Leaders Impriſon'd; reckoning James the Son of Soſas for the Chief. And though much could not be Expected from the Common Soldiers, now the Officers were gone; the reſt of the Idumæans were kept yet under a Stricter Guard: and all too little to hinder them from running over. There were many cut-off, 'tis True; but more that ſcap'd: and they were all receiv'd, for Titus had too much Generoſity and Good Nature to preſs his Former Prohibition to the Uttermoſt Rigour: and the very Soldiers Themſelves, betwixt the Hope of Booty, and a Glut of Bloud, began to betake themſelves to a Courſe of Humanity and Moderation. As for the Common People, (which were All that were now left) they were ſold with their Wives and Children, like Beaſts, in a Market; and at very Eaſie Rates too, and but Few Purchaſers. Titus reflecting upon This, and upon his Own Proclamation, forbidding any more Jews to come over to him Single; out of a Deſire to ſave as many of them as he could: he was now pleaſed to Diſpenſe with his Own Order, and to receive as Many of them, One by One, as preſented themſelves: But with Superviſors over them, to diſtinguiſh the Good from the Bad, and to deal with them according to their Merits. There were vaſt Numbers of them Sold, and Upward of Forty Thouſand ſet at Liberty by Titus, to go whither they would.

So hs went out, and gave him over the Wall Two Candleſticks like Thoſe in the Temple; ſome Tables, Cups, and Goblets; all Subſtantial and Pure Gold: He gave him alſo ſeveral Veils, Sacerdotal Habits, Precious Stones, and a Great Number of Sacrificing Veſſels.

The Mounts are now finiſhed: and the Romans advance with their Machines.

THE Works being now finiſh'd, on the 7th of the Month Gorpiæus, or September, (having been Eighteen Days a-doing) the Romans advanc'd their Machines; and That Part of the Faction that Deſpair'd of holding-out quitted the Walls, and withdrew to the Caſtle; Others into Privy Houſes and Vaults: but the more Reſolute ſtopp'd, and made Head againſt Thoſe that were to Menage the Battery: the Enemy all this while being ſuperior to them, both in Strength and Number; over and above the Advantage of Men in Heart, and puffed-up with Succeſs againſt a Sad, a Deſpairing, and an Unfortunate People. So ſoon as ever they took Notice of any Flaw in the Wall, or that any of the Turrets gave way to the Engines, the Defendents ſhifted immediately away as faſt as they could: inſomuch that Simon and John Themſelves were ſeized with a Panick Terrour; and fled, even before the Romans were come within diſtance of doing them any Hurt: and yet at the ſame time they had their Fits of Aſtoniſhment upon them. It would have griev'd a Body's Heart, though for the Vileſt of Miſcreants, to ſee Thoſe Men trembling and knocking their Knees as if they were ſinking into the Ground, that had been but juſt before, in the Ruffe of their Arrogance, and Preſumption, both in Word and Actions. Never ſo Wonderful a Change! They made an Attempt indeed upon the Wall of Circumvallation that the Romans rais'd about the Town. In ſhort, they attack'd it, and made a Breach in't; with a Reſolution to fall upon the Guards, and make an Eſcape: but perceiving, when they look'd to be Seconded, that their Friends had all forſaken them, they hurry'd away in a Confuſion, as their Fears and their Neceſſities mov'd them. In This Phantaſtical Variety of Frightful Things and Thoughts, every Man fram'd a Story according to his Imagination. One brings News that the Whole Wall to the Weſtward, was Overthrown; Others, that the Romans were juſt at the Foot of it: ſome, that they were Enter'd, and ſuch and ſuch of them ſeen in Poſſeſſion of the Towers. Whatever they fear'd, they ſaw; falling Proſtrate upon their Faces, and bemoaning their Follies in a Paſſion, as if they had been Thunder-ſtruck, not knowing which way to turn themſelves.

The quitting of Theſe Three Towers did the Whole Work.

The Timorous Part of the Faction withdraws; ſome to Acra: Others into the City Vaults: but the Reſolute ſtand their Ground. The Enemy the Stronger Party of the Two. Simon and John in a Fit of Deſperation and Horrour; and abandon'd by all their Friends.

Miſled by Frightful Stories and Falſe Alarums.

And Infatuated into the giving up of Three Forts that could never have been taken but by Starving.

The Power of God on the One hand, and his Goodneſs on the Other, was very Remarkable upon This Occaſion; for the Tyrants ruin'd Themſelves, by quitting thoſe Holds of their Own Accord, that could never have been taken but by Famine: and This, after the Jews had ſpent ſo much time to no Purpoſe upon Other Pieces of leſs Value. By This Means, the Romans became Maſters of Three Impregnable Forts, by Fortune, that could never have been taken any other Way: for the Three Famous Towers formerly mentioned, were Proof againſt all Battery.

Upon Simon and John's quitting Theſe Towers; or rather, upon their being driven out of them by the Impulſe of a Judicial Infatuation, they haſten'd away to the Vale of Siloa, where they took Breath a while; and after ſome Recollection and Refreſhment, they gave an Aſſault to the New Wall there: but ſo Faint and Weak, that the Guards beat them off; for betwixt Fatigue, Deſpondency, Dread and Miſery, their Strength fail'd them, and they were then ſcatter'd ſeveral Ways into Sinks and Gutters.

The Romans being now poſſeſs'd of the Walls, planted their Colours upon the Towers with Outcries and Shouts of Joy, to find the End of the War ſo much Eaſier then the Beginning: if at leaſt the War was now at an End, which they could not well doubt of without diſtruſting their Own Eyes.

The

The Soldiers were now broke loose all over the Town, up and down, in the Streets, with their Swords drawn; killing all that fell in their Way without Distinction; and burning Entire Houses, and whatever was in them, in One Common Flame. In several Places, where they Enter'd to search for Pillage, they found Whole Families Dead, and the Houses cramm'd with Hunger-starv'd Carcasses: so that upon the Horrour of so Hideous a Spectacle, they came out again Empty-handed; but the Compassion they had for the Dead, made them not one jot Tenderer to the Living; for they Stabb'd every Man they met, till the Narrow Passages and Alleys were choak't-up with Carcasses: So that the Channels of the City ran Bloud, as if it had been to quench the Fire. In the Evening, they gave over killing, and at night fell afresh to burning.

The Romans carry all before them, to the Extremities of Fire and Bloud.

The Eighth of the Month Gorpieus put an End to the Conflagration of Jerusalem, and if all the Blessings it ever Enjoy'd from the Foundation of it, had but been Comparable in Proportion to the Calamities it suffer'd in This Siege, That City had been undoubtedly the Envy of the World. But the Greatest Plague of all came out of its Own Bowels; in That Infernal Race of Vipers that it brought forth, to Eat-out the Belly of the Mother.

The Jews, like Vipers, Eat out the Belly of their Mother.

While Titus was now taking a View of the Ruines of This Glorious City; the Works, the Fortifications, and especially the Turrets, which the Tyrants had so sortishly abandon'd: While Cæsar, I say, was Entertaining himself in the Contemplation of the Height, Dimensions, and Situation of these Towers; the Design, Workmanship, and Curiosity of the Fabrick; with the Wonderful Contrivance of the Whole: he let fall This Expression. [Well! says he, if God had not fought both for us, and with us, we could never have been Masters of These Forts. It was God, in fine, that assisted us, and God that fought against the Jews; for This was not an Undertaking to be Compass'd with Hands or Machines.] When Titus had said This and a Great deal more upon the same Subject, it was his next Care to set all the Prisoners at Liberty that the Tyrants had left in the Towers: and afterwards, upon the Rasing and Demolishing of the City, to preserve Those Turrets as a Monument to the Honour of his Good Fortune; without whose Assistance he could never have done what he did.

A Monument Erected to his Good Fortune.

The Soldiers being now quite spent with doing Execution, and having a great deal more of That Work yet to do, Titus order'd his Men to hold their Hands; saving only to Those that they found Arm'd, or in a Posture of Resistance, and to give Quarter to all the rest. But the Soldiers went beyond their Commission, and put the Aged and the Sickly to the Sword promiscuously, with their Companions; and for Those that were Strong and Serviceable, they shut them up in the Temple, in the Women's Quarter: Cæsar appointing Fronto, one of his Friends and Freemen, to Enform himself of the People, and to do by them as they deserv'd. As for the Ruffians, and the Seditious, that peach'd one another, he had them all put to death: But for Men of Comely and Graceful Persons, and in the Prime of their Youth, he reserv'd Them for the Triumph; sending away all of above Seventeen of the Remainder of them, in Chains into Ægypt, to be Employ'd in Servile Offices and Drudgery: beside Those that were distributed up and down the Provinces for the Use of the Theatres in the Quality of Sword-men, or Gladiators; and All under Seventeen, exposed to Sale.

Titus gives Order about the Prisoners.

In the mean time, while the Prisoners were under Fronto's Charge, there were Eleven Thousand of them starv'd to death, betwixt the Churlishness of the Keepers that would give them no Meat; and the Squeamishness of their Own Stomachs that would swallow none. But in truth, the Mouths were too many for the Provision.

CHAP. XVII.

The Number of the Dead, and of the Prisoners in This War. John and Simon Taken: the One kept for the Triumph: the Other a Prisoner for Life. The City a Heap of Ashes, and the Walls thrown down.

THE Number of Prisoners in This War was Ninety Seven Thousand. The Number of the Dead was Eleven Hundred Thousand; the Greater part of them Jews by Nation, though not Natives of Judæa: for it was only a General Meeting of them at Jerusalem, gather'd together from all Quarters to Celebrate the Feast of the Passover; who were there surpriz'd into a War. There was so Prodigious a Multitude; and They so streighten'd for Lodgings, that the Croud first brought the Plague into the Town; and then quickly made way for a Famine. Not but that the City was abundantly Capable yet of Entertaining That vaſt Body of People, if the Calculation of Ceſtius at leaſt may paſs for any thing: as follws.

Nero had ſo Great a Contempt for the Jews, that Ceſtius made it his Suit to the High-Prieſt to bethink themſelves ſome way of Numbering their People: and This he did out of a deſire to give Nero to Underſtand, that the Jewiſh Nation was not ſo deſpicable as he imagin'd; ſo that they took their time to Enter upon the Computation, at the Celebration of their Paſchal Feaſt: when Offering up Sacrifices according to Cuſtom from the Ninth Hour of the Day to the Eleventh, and Thoſe Sacrifices to be Eaten afterwards in their Families, by Ten at leaſt, and ſometimes Twenty to a Lamb: They reckon'd upon Two Hundred Fifty Six Thouſand and Five Hundred Oblations; which, at the rate of Ten to a Lamb, amounted to Two Millions and Five Hundred and Fifty Six Thouſand Perſons; All Pure and Sound, for neither Lepers, Scorbuticks, Men troubled with Gonorrhœa's, Women in their Monthly Sickneſs, or People labouring under any Malignant Diſtempers, were admitted to any Part in This Solemnity: no more were any Strangers, but what came thither for Religion. So that This Mighty Concourſe of People from abroad before the Siege, was afterwards by the Righteous Providence of God, coop't-up in the City as in a Priſon: and the Number of the Slain in that Siege was the Heavieſt Judgment of the kind that ever was heard of. Some were kill'd Openly; Others kept in Cuſtody by the Romans, who ſearch'd the very Sepulchres and Vaults for them, and put all they found Alive to the Sword. There were upward of Two Thouſand, that had either laid Violent Hands on Themſelves, or kill'd one another by Conſent; beſide Thoſe that periſh'd by Famine. The Putrid Corruption of the Dead Bodies ſent out a Vapour to Poyſon as many as came within the reach of it. Some were not able to Endure it, and went out of the Way; Others had their Hearts ſo ſet upon Booty, that they rifled the very Carcaſſes, and trampled upon the Dead Bodies as they lay ſoaking in their Corruption. But Avarice ſticks at nothing. They brought out ſeveral Priſoners alſo that the Two Tyrants had laid in Chains there; for they kept-up their Cruelty to the laſt: but God's Juſtice overtook them Both in the End; for John, and his Brethren in the Vaults, were now driven by the Diſtreſs of an Inſupportable Hunger, to beg That Mercy of the Romans, that they had ſo often Deſpis'd: and Simon, after a long Struggle with an Inſuperable Neceſſity (as we ſhall ſhew hereafter) deliver'd up Himſelf: the Latter being reſerv'd for the Triumph, and John made a Priſoner for Life. The Romans, after This, burnt the Remainder of the City, and threw down the Walls.

Jeruſalem Taken, and Deſtroy'd.

THus was Jeruſalem Taken, and utterly deſtroy'd, in the Second year of Veſpaſian, and on the Eighth Day of the Month Gorpieus; having been Five times Taken before: i. e. by Azochæus, King of Ægypt; Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria; Pompey; and Herod, with Soſius; who did all preſerve the City after it was Taken. But Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, laid it Waſt, (a) Thirteen Hundred Sixty Years, Eight Months and Six Days after the Building of it.

Melchizedeck the Firſt Founder of it.

The Firſt Founder of it was a Chanaanitiſh Prince, call'd Melchizedeck, which in the Hebrew Language ſignifies a Juſt King: for ſuch he was in an eminent manner. (b) He firſt Dedicated This City to God; Erected a Temple in it, and Officiated in the Quality of a Prieſt; giving it the Name of Jeruſalem, which before was call'd Solyma.

Melchizedeck changed Solyma into Jeruſalem.

When David the King of the Jews came afterwards to drive out the Chanaanites, he planted his Own People there: and in Four Hundred (c) Seventy Seven Years and Three Months, after This, it was laid Waſt by the Babylonians.

From the Reign of David there, to the Deſtruction of the City by Titus, it was Eleven Hundred and Seventy Nine Years; and Two Thouſand One Hundred Seventy Seven from the Foundation of it. But neither Antiquity, Wealth, Fame, nor the Honour of the Religion it ſelf, was any Security againſt the Appointments of Fate.

This was, in fine, the Iſſue of the Siege: and when the Soldiers had neither Rapine nor Bloodſhed for their Spleens to Work upon, (as they would not have been Idle, if they had had Matter) Titus order'd them to lay the City and Temple level with the Ground; and to leave nothing ſtanding, but the Three Famous Turrets, Phaſael, Hippicos, and Mariamne, that over-topp'd all the reſt; and a Piece of Wall to the Weſtward of the Town, where he deſign'd a Garriſon: The Towers to remain as ſo many Monuments to Poſterity of the Romans Power and Conduct in the Taking of them. This Order was punctually Executed; and All the reſt laid ſo Flat, that the Place look'd as if it had never been Inhabited. This was the End of the Jeruſalem-Faction; a Mad and a Seditious People: and This was alſo the End of the moſt Glorious City of the Univerſe. The City laid Level with the Ground.

Titus provides for the Honour and Reward of Thoſe that Behaved themſelves Bravely in the War. A Generous Speech of his to his Soldiers, accompany'd with Bounties and Preſents. Titus offers a Thanksgiving Sacrifice for his Victory.

CÆſar having now taken up a Reſolution to leave the Tenth Legion in Garriſon in Jeruſalem, with ſome Squadrons and Battalions of Horſe and Foot; and having diſcharg'd all the Parts of a Vigilant and a Careful General, he came now to bethink himſelf of Encouraging and Rewarding Thoſe that had ſignaliz'd themſelves in his Service. Now to This End, he mounted a Tribunal, with the Choice of his Great Officers about him, in the Head of his Camp, and upon an Eminence where he might beſt be heard; and from thence deliver'd himſelf to his Army in Terms to This Effect. Titus provides, now the War is over, for the Honour and Reward of Thoſe that ſerved him in it.

It is Impoſſible, (ſays he) My Brave Fellow-Soldiers, to expreſs how kindly I take the Generous Faith and Reſpects you have been pleas'd to pay me all along This War; " and ſo " he Enter'd upon the Topiques of their Orderly Diſcipline and Obedience; their In- " vincible Firmneſs and Reſolution upon all Occaſions, and in the moſt Preſſing of " Dangers; the Reputation they acquir'd in advancing the Honour, and Enlarging " the Territory of their Country: and finally in giving all Men to Underſtand, " that neither Odds of Numbers, advantages of Forts, Strength of Places, Power of " Populous Cities, the Hair-brain'd Madneſs, or the Outrageous Fury of Brutal " Adverſaries, can ever Diſcompoſe the Roman Conduct and Courage. Not but " that now and then by Fits, the Jews have had ſome Favourable Turns of Fortune " too: But it is a Great Thing, however, (ſays he) to put a Happy End to a War " that has been ſo long a-foot; which is as much as they could wiſh for Themſelves " when they firſt Embark'd in't. And it is a Greater yet, (ſays he) to ſee your " Choice of the Roman Emperours and Generals, not only admitted; but Univer- " ſally and Thankfully approv'd. He could not, (he ſaid) but love and admire " them all for what they had Worthily done: But for Thoſe that made themſelves " Exemplary in their Adventures and Hazzards, and in doing Honour to their Cha- " racter and Profeſſion, it ſhould be His Care (he ſaid) to do them all manner of " Right in Return: and whoever ſhew'd an Æmulation to Outdo his Fellows, ſhould " be ſure of an Acknowledgment in Proportion; for he took much more Delight " in Preferring and Advancing the Virtuous, then in Puniſhing Offenders. Titus to his Soldiers.

Titus, immediately, upon This, call'd for an Account from ſome of the Officers that had the Commiſſion in Charge, to know which of the Soldiers had done any thing Extraordinary in the War. They were produced One and One by Name; Highly Commended; and Titus as much Concern'd for Their Good as for his Own. From Fair and Obliging Words, he proceeded to Matter of Liberality and Bounty. He Crown'd them with Coronets of Gold; dreſs'd them up with Gold-Chains; gave them Launces pointed with Gold; Silver Medals; and advanced every Man in his Quality and Station. He gave them Minted Mony in Gold and Silver out of the Booty; with Robes, and Other Things of Value. So ſoon as This Diſtribution was over; to every Man according to his Merit; Cæſar, accompany'd with the Vows, Prayers, and Acclamations of the Whole Army, deſcended from his Tribunal to Offer Sacrifices and give Thanks for his Victory. There was a Vaſt Multitude of Oxen there at hand about the Altars, which were Sacrific'd and diſtributed to the Army; Cæſar himſelf Feaſting his Officers for Three Days. The Troups, after This, were ſent away to their reſpective Quarters: and Jeruſalem committed to the Guard of the Tenth Legion; without ſending it back to Euphrates, whence it came. Titus Treats his Officers with Bounties and Preſents, according to their Deſerts; And Offers a Thanksgiving Sacrifice for his Victory.

Titus had not as yet forgotten the Affront the Jews put upon the Romans under Ceſtius; and ſo he ſent away the Twelfth Legion that had been formerly at Raphanee, to Melitene, that lies along the Euphrates upon the Borders of Cappadocia and Armenia: keeping the Fifth and Fifteenth Legions to Himſelf as a Competent Guard to Convoy him into Ægypt. From hence he took his Paſſage to Cæſarea upon the Coaſt; but being Winter, he durſt not venture into Italy: ſo that he laid up his Booty and Treaſure there for the Preſent, and took Care for the Securing of his Priſoners.

DUring the Siege of Jeruſalem by Titus, Veſpaſian Imbarqu'd upon a Merchantman for Rhodes, where he took a Gally, and ſo paſs'd out of Ionia into Greece; viſiting all the Towns in his Way, where he was moſt Magnificently receiv'd: From thence, to Corcyra, and ſo to Japygia; and thence he continu'd his Journy by Land. Titus was now come back from Cæſarea upon the Sea-Coaſt, to that called Cæſarea Philippi; where he made a Conſiderable Stay, Entertaining himſelf with all manner of Spectacles: as Combats betwixt Men and Beaſts, Man and Man, Troup and Troup; which coſt him the Lives of a great many of his Slaves.

Simon the Son of Gioras taken Priſoner; and the Manner of it. He Contrives his Eſcape thorough a Vault.

In This Juncture Simon the Son of Gioras happen'd to be Taken, and the Manner of it was This; Simon, upon the Siege of Jeruſalem, was forced into the Upper-Town: and the Romans breaking into the City, put him to his Wits End how to ſhift for Himſelf: and his Contrivance was This. He call'd a Councel of Miners, Stone-Cutters, Smiths, and Men Well-Skill'd in Iron-Works; got a Proviſion of Tools and Materials for his Purpoſe; ſo many Weeks Proviſions, and ſo let themſelves down All together into a Dark and a Secret Vault. When they had made their way as far as they could, and found the Paſſage too Narrow to receive them, they fell to Digging and Mining, in Hope to Work a Thorough-Fare, and ſo make an Eſcape. But before they could advance any thing to ſpeak of, their Victuals fell ſhort, and the Plot fail'd; though they Menag'd their Stores the beſt they could too. Simon had no way now left him, but to try if he could fright the Romans out of their Senſes; and ſo Dreſſed himſelf up in a White Garment Buckled about him, and a Purple Cloak thrown over it. In This Figure he preſented himſelf out of the Ground from under the Ruines of the Late Temple, to the Amazement of the Soldiers and Others that firſt ſaw the Apparition; but upon coming nearer and nearer, they took the Heart to ask him his Name, and who he was; and Simon refuſing to tell them, call'd to ſpeak with the Captain of the Guard. So Terentius Rufus, who had the Command, was immediately fetch'd; who ſifting the Truth out of him, clapt him preſently in Chains, and gave Cæſar afterwards an Account of the Whole Story. Thus was This Bloudy Tyrant, who had taken away ſo many of his Countrymen's Lives by Subornation and Falſe Evidence, upon Pretence of their going over to the Romans, brought to Juſtice Himſelf, and deliver'd into the Hands of his Enemies, without any Force upon him, by his Own Act. But there is no avoiding the Stroke of Divine Vengeance; no Contending with the Power of Innocence and Juſtice: and the Puniſhment is yet the more Grievous many times for being deferr'd; and when People reckon themſelves ſecure, and the Danger over. This was Simon's Caſe in the Hands of the Romans; and his Phantaſtical Riſing out of the Ground prov'd an Occaſion of diſcovering divers of his Companions in their Hiding-Places.

But his Project fails him.

Terentius Rufus ſeizes him, and lays him in Chains.

There is no Avoiding of Divine Vengeance.

Simon gives Occaſion to further Diſcoveries.

Upon Cæſar's coming back to Cæſarea by the Sea-ſide, and the Preſenting of Simon to him in Chains, Titus Order'd Simon to be kept for his Triumph at Rome. When he had been there a while, he ſet a Day a-part for the Celebration of his Brother Domitian's Birth-day with a very Splendid Pomp; and a Great Number of his Condemn'd Priſoners dedicated to the Honour of the Solemnity: reckoning upon Thoſe that were deſtroy'd by Beaſts, Fire, and in Combat one with another, to be at leaſt Two Thouſand and Five Hundred in Number: and All too little in the Opinion of the Romans, who hated them Mortally. Titus went afterward to Berytus, a City of Phœnicia, and a Roman Colony; where he alſo continu'd for ſome time, and kept his Father's Birth-day with more Splendour and Magnificence then the Former, both for Spectacles and Other Expenſive Entertainments.

And is Himſelf Reſerv'd for a Triumph at Rome.

THE Jews in Antioche had now a very Hard time of it; the City being Spitefully bent againſt them, as well upon the Account of New Matter, as for Miſdemeanours of Former Date. But it will be requiſite to ſpeak a Word or Two of This now by the Way, in Order to the Better Underſtanding of what is to come.

The Jews Diſpers'd over the Face of the Earth, in Syria eſpecially, and more Particularly in Antioche.

The Jews are a People diſpers'd over the Face of the Whole Earth: Particularly among the Syrians, as they are near Neighbours; and more eſpecially in Antioche, where there are Great Numbers of them, not only upon the account of its being a Large and a Populous City; but alſo by reaſon of the Privileges, and Immunities they have Enjoy'd there by the Favour of the Government ever ſince the Days of Antiochus Epiphanes (as they call'd him) who laid waſt the City of Jeruſalem, and Rifled the Temple. The Succeſſors of This Antiochus cauſed Reſtitution to be made to the Jews, of all the Brazen Veſſels that had been taken away, and to be Dedicated to the Service of their Synagogue at Antioche, allowing them the ſame Freedom of the City with the Greeks; and they were likewiſe Treated by the Following Kings after the ſame manner; Their Numbers Encreaſing, and their Temple Rich and Flouriſhing: inſomuch that ſeveral Pagan Proſelytes came over to them, and Incorporated with the Nation.

The Antiochian Jews are Numerous and Wealthy.

Now upon the breaking up of the War, and Veſpaſian's paſſing by Sea into Syria, the Jews made themſelves Extremely Odious. As for Inſtance. There was One Antiochus the Son of one of the moſt Eminent Jews they had in Antioche, both for Quality and Power. This Antiochus, coming into the Theatre upon a Publique Meeting, Openly charg'd his Father, and Certain other Forreign Jews, by Name, in the Face of the Aſſembly, with a Deſign to Fire the City in the Night. This Tranſported the Multitude into ſo Outrageous an Uproar, that they call'd immediately for Fire, and burnt the Pretended Conſpirators in the Middle of the Theatre. The Rabble were preſently for doing the ſame Execution upon all the reſt, and Securing their Country before it was too Late. Antiochus kept up the Croſs Humour all he could; and as an Argument of the Affection he had for the Pagan Worſhip, and his Averſion to That of the Jews, he did not only Sacrifice after the Pagan Manner Himſelf; but forc'd Others to do ſo too, upon pain of Death to the Refuſers. Upon This Difficulty, the Antiochians comply'd; but the Jews moſt of them ſtood out, and were put to death. Antiochus being by This time in a Better Condition to wreak his Spite upon the Jews; having a Command given him by the Governor, he began upon the Subject of the Sabbaoth, with Preſſing People upon That Point, and forcing them to work indifferently upon That Day, as well as upon Others; and carrying Things on to That Extremity, that the Feſtival was not only laid aſide in Antioche, but in Danger to be quite Abrogated likewiſe every where elſe.

Antiochus, the Son of a Jew, the Ruin of Antioche.

An Execrable Uproar.

He ſuppreſſes the Obſervation of the Sabbaoth.

This Perſecution of the Jews at Antioche, was follow'd upon the Heel with Another; which was This. The Square-Market, with ſeveral Offices for Publique Regiſtries and Records, and Other Stately Buildings, happening all to take Fire: the Flame was ſo Fierce, that it was Odds the Whole City had been burnt to the Ground. Antiochus laid it upon the Jews; and the Antiochians were apt enough to believe it, for the very ſake of the Late Story; even if they had not been Prepoſſeſs'd againſt them Beforehand. For the Impreſſion upon them was ſo ſtrong, that they could almoſt have Sworn they had ſeen the Jews with their Own Eyes, in the very Act of Firing it. Now taking it for granted upon This Preſumption, they fell upon the Perſons accus'd, with ſo Outrageous a Fury, that Collega, the Vice Governour to Cæſennius Petus, had the moſt to do in the World to keep the People Quiet, only till Cæſar might be duly Enform'd of the Whole Affair. Cæſennius had his Commiſſion of Governour already; but was not as yet come to his Command. Now Collega, upon a Strict Examination of the Matter, made it out as Clear as the Sun, that Antiochus's Incendiaries were Every Man of them Innocent. And This Villany, in fine, was found to be the Work of a few Profligate Spendthrifts, and Men of Deſperate Fortunes, that had no better way to ſecure themſelves from their Creditors, then by deſtroying the Evidences. But the Jews were not yet without aking Hearts for fear of what might be the Iſſue even of a Falſe Accuſation.

The City takes Fire; and Antiochus laid it falſely upon the Jews.

CHAP. XXII.

Titus Overjoyed at his Father's ſafe Arrival in Italy.

Titus was at this time Overjoy'd with the Welcome News he received from his Father, of his Happy Arrival in Italy; and how Glorioufly the Italian Cities had Entertain'd him all the way as he paſs'd: but the Thing that Tranſported him beyond all the reſt, was the Tenderneſs and the Magnificence of his Reception at Rome; which deliver'd the Son from any farther Anxiety for the Proſperous Succeſſes of his Father. The People pay'd Veſpaſian at all diſtances, the ſame Veneration as if he had been upon the Place; and the Paſſionate Deſire they had to ſee him, did in ſome Meaſure ſupply for his Abſence in That Interval. The Senate that had it Freſh in their Memories what Miſerable Revolutions they had ſeen, upon the Transferring of Governments from One Prince to Another, reckon'd themſelves Happy in the Bleſſing of an Emperour that brought Reputation, Conduct and Experience along with him into the Adminiſtration: and the Common People were no leſs pleas'd with the Change; eſpecially being at That time Embroil'd in Civil Wars, and likewiſe in a Further Truſt and Confidence of being Reſtor'd, by His Means, to their Ancient Freedom and Plenty. And ſo for the Military Part, the Soldiers Hearts were ſet upon him above all Others, for the Proofs he had given them, upon ſeveral Occaſions, of his Martial Skill and Courage: beſide the Senſe of the Shame and the Scandal they had ſuffer'd under Other Commanders; concluding that no Man was ſo fit or likely to ſet them right as Veſpaſian.

All People Charm'd with Titus's Affability and Addreſs.

This Prince was ſo Univerſally belov'd, that the Great Men had not the Patience to wait any longer for his coming at a diſtance, and ſo went out and met him a good way off from the City: and ſuch Numbers of People after them, that more came out then ſtay'd behind. When Veſpaſian was advanc'd near the Town, and Word brought how all People were Charm'd with the Good Graces of his Affability and Addreſs, the Ways were all throng'd up with their Wives and Children out of a longing Curioſity to ſee him; breaking out into Raptures of Admiration all the way they went, at the Gentleneſs of his Faſhion and Perſon; calling him alſo a Thouſand Benefactors, Deliverers and Protectors, and Crying him up as the Only Prince under the Sun, that deſerv'd an Imperial Crown. The Whole City, in fine, was ſo dreſs'd-up and ſet-out with Garlands and Perfumes, that it look'd like a Temple; and the Streets ſo Crouded, that there was hardly any paſſing to the Palace: Veſpaſian, in the mean time, offering-up to his Houſhold-Gods Gratulatory Sacrifices of Thankſgiving for his ſafe Return; while the Multitude gave themſelves up to Feaſting with their Tribes, Families and Neighbours, wiſhing a Long and a Happy Reign to Veſpaſian, and a Continuance of the Imperial Sovereignty to his Son, and Thoſe of the Line, that ſhould come after him. This was the Manner of Veſpaſian's Entrance into Rome; and it was follow'd with all ſorts of Felicity and Good Fortune.

Germany Revolts. The Occaſion of it. Caſſius and Civilis the Ringleaders of a Faction. Petilius Cerealis breaks the Neck of the Sedition. Domitian puts an End to it without Bloud. The German Rebellion follow'd with an Incurſion of Scythians. Rubrius Gallus puts them all to the Rout.

Germany Revolts, and what mov'd them to it.

A Little before Veſpaſian's coming to Alexandria, Titus being at That time before Jeruſalem, there happen'd a Great Revolt among the Germans; which was Animated and Encourag'd by their Neighbours the Gauls, in hope to ſhake-off the Roman Yoak. Now the Germans being naturally Hot-Headed, Forward and Inconſiderate, were apt enough of Themſelves to Engage in Raſh Undertakings: over and above that they were puſh'd on by a Mortal Hatred they had for the Romans, as the only Power they fear'd: To which may be added a Favourable Conjuncture of the Times, in regard of the Preſent Factions and Diviſions of the Empire, upon ſo many Turns and Changes of Government.

Caſſius and Civilis the Heads of a Faction.

Caſſius and Civilis, Two Perſons of Eminent Credit among the Germans, took Advantage of Theſe Diſtractions, to advance a Sedition; which was in Effect but what they had in their Hearts long before. Upon ſounding the People how they ſtood ſtood affected, they found the Greater Part of them Ready for Miſchief; and in all Probability the reſt would have follow'd their Example, if it had not been for a Divine Providence that prevented it. Now the Fact was This. Petilius Cerealis, formerly Governour of Germany, Receiv'd Letters from Veſpaſian declaring him Conſul; and with Orders likewiſe to March forthwith into Italy, and take upon him That Command. While Cerealis was upon the way, he got Notice of This Inſurrection; March'd againſt the Rebels as they were in a Body; Charg'd, and put them to the Rout with a very Great Slaughter, and ſo brought the reſt to their Wits again and their Duty.

Petilius Cerealis by Providence breaks the Neck of the Sedition;

But if This had not been done when it was, by Cerealis, the ſame Thing would have been done very ſuddenly by Another Hand: For no ſooner was the Noiſe of This Rebellion come to Rome, but Domitian the Son of Veſpaſian, a Pregnant Young Prince that inherited the Heroical Spirit of his Valiant Father, put himſelf in the Head of an Army againſt Theſe Barbarians: who took ſuch a Fright upon the very Rumour of his March, that they render'd themſelves immediately, without Striking a Blow; reaping This Advantage by it, that they reconcil'd themſelves to their Old Maſters without Bloud. When Gaul was ſettled, and out of Danger of a Relapſe, Domitian went back again to Rome, laden with Vows and Acclamations for the Miracles he had wrought (even above his Age) to the Honour both of Himſelf and his Country.

And Domitian puts a Final End to it without Bloud.

This Rebellion of the Germans was follow'd with a Furious Incurſion of the Scythians (or Sarmatians;) who ſlipping over the Danube, by Stealth, with a vaſt Body of Men, brake into Myſia, ſurpriz'd ſeveral Roman Garriſons; and with a Mercyleſs Cruelty put them all to the Sword. They Kill'd alſo the Lieutenant General Fonteius Agrippa, a Man of Conſular Authority, in the Head of his Troups; and ſo ran up and down, Burning, Waſting and Ravaging the Whole Province. So ſoon as This came to Veſpaſian's Ear, and what Havock had been made in Myſia, he Diſpatch'd away Rubrius Gallus to call them to an Account; who did very Great Execution upon them; and for Thoſe that ſcap'd, they made a hard ſhift to get Home: ſo that This War was quickly over, and the General took Care to ſecure the Paſſages thereabouts from any ſuch Incurſions and Attempts for the time to come.

The German Rebellion is follow'd with an Incurſion of Scythians; Rubrius Gallus puts them all to the Rout.

TItus, in his Return from Perytus, after ſome ſhort ſtay there, (as we have ſaid before) treated all the Towns, as he paſs'd through Syria, with moſt Magnificent Spectacles; Carrying his Captives along with him for the Honour of his Arms, and the Ornament of his Triumph.

Titus Marches in Triumph with his Priſoners and his Spectacles.

This Prince took Notice of a Certain River in This Journy, betwixt Arce and Raphane, Two Cities in the Kingdom of Agrippa, that had ſomewhat in it very remarkable. (a) While This River flows, it has a Full Stream and a Strong Current: but on a ſudden the Springs fail, and for Six Days it leaves the Channel dry to the very bottom. On the Seventh Day, as if there had been no change, it fills again, and obſerves the ſame courſe as before. Hence it hath taken the Name of the Sabbatical River, alluding to the Seventh-Day's Feſtival of the Jews.

The Sabbatical River; which is dry Six Days, and runs the Seventh. And why ſo call'd.

(a) Pliny in his Natural Hiſtory, l. 31. c. 2. aſſures us, that this River is dried up every Sabbath-day, and the Jewiſh Rabbins *are of the ſame Opinion. Gisb. Cuperus, without omitting any Words, reads the Text otherwiſe by a tranſpoſition. According to his Emendation, the tranſlation is as follows: Feraturque impetu non leni per ſpatium ſex dierum: inde totus ab ipſis fontibus deficiens, ſiccum prebet ſpectandum alveum; & hinc, quaſi nulla facta eſſet mutatio, ſimilis poſt ſeptimum diem erumpit. See Cuneus de Rep. When Antioche Overjoy'd at the Coming of Titus.

When the People of Antioche underſtood that Titus was coming That Way, they were ſo Tranſported with the Tidings, that Men, Women, and Children, Poſted away a Matter of Thirty Furlongs out of the Town to meet him, out of an Impatience to Wiſh him Joy, and bid him Welcome upon the Way. As he drew near, they made him a Lane to receive him, and ſo with all Poſſible Demonſtration of Affection and Reſpect they Conducted him to the City; ſtill intermingling, with their Shouts and Acclamations, Earneſt Prayers and Importunities, to baniſh all the Jews out of the City. Titus gave them the Hearing, in ſuch a Manner as if he had not much minded what they ſaid: inſomuch, that the Jews were in Great Pain and Trouble to think what might come of it. Titus made no Stay in Antioche, but went immediately to Teugma, toward Euphrates; where he was attended with an Embaſſy from Vologeſus the King of Parthia, and the Compliment of a Golden Crown, to Joy him of his Victory over the Jews. Titus accepted the Preſent; Treated the Embaſſadors, and ſo went back again to Antioche. He was no ſooner upon the Place, but the Senate and the Magiſtracy invited him with Great Earneſtneſs to the Theatre; which he very Graciouſly Comply'd with, and there found a Mighty Concourſe of the Citizens waiting for his coming. The Firſt Thing they did was to ply him over and over with Freſh Inſtances for the Expelling of the Jews; to which, Titus, with his Ordinary Preſence of Mind, gave them This Anſwer: That their Own Country was Deſtroy'd, and that no Other would receive them. When they ſaw This would not do, they try'd him with Another Requeſt: That is to ſay; That the Pillars of Braſs, with the Inſcriptions upon them of the Jews Privileges, might be either Remov'd, or Defaced. Titus would not Intereſt himſelf in This neither; but left the Jews at Antioche in the ſame State as he found them, and ſo went his Way for Ægypt.

The People preſs the Baniſhing of the Jews out of That City.

Titus goes his Way without minding Them.

Titus gives Them a Final Refuſal, and ſo away he goes for Ægypt.

As he was upon his Journey, and ſaw the Miſerable Deſolated Condition of Jeruſalem, and the Country all about it, he could not but Compare within Himſelf the Difference betwixt what he had known it formerly, and what he now found it: That is to ſay; the Difference betwixt a Deſart and a Paradiſe, a Heap of Rubbiſh, and the moſt Glorious Pile of Buildings under the Heavens. Upon Theſe Thoughts, he could not but Paſſionately deplore the Deſtruction of ſo Famous a City, and Curſe the Authors of the Sedition that were the Cauſe of it. And ſo far was He from pretending to Raiſe his Reputation upon a Publique Calamity, that he could not forbear Execrating the Inſtruments that forc'd him upon This Extremity.

The ſad State of Jeruſalem goes to the Heart of Titus.

A Vaſt Treaſure Bury'd in the Ruines of That City.

The City was infinitely Rich, and a Vaſt Treaſure bury'd in the Ruines of it, as Gold and Silver, and Other Precious Goods to an Ineſtimable Value, that the Owners had hid out of the way for fear of the Enemy: ſome the Romans found out; but the Greateſt Diſcovery was made by the Priſoners. Titus, being all this while upon his Journy into Ægypt, made what Haſte he could over That Forlorn Waſted Country to Alexandria, and ſo to Imbarque from thence to Italy; ſending back the Two Legions that came along with him to their Old Quarters: That is to ſay; the Fifth to Myſia, and the Tenth into Hungary. But for Simon and John, the Heads of the Priſoners, and a Matter of Seven Hundred more of them, all Proper Handſom Men. Theſe were to be Tranſported into Italy for the Grace and Glory of his Triumph.

Simon and John, and 700 Choice Men more, Reſerv'd for the Grace of the Triumph.

His Paſſage to Rome was as Fair and Proſperous as he could Wiſh, and the People treated him with the ſame Offices of Honour and Reſpect, as they had done his Father: beſide that Veſpaſian himſelf had the Goodneſs to go out with the reſt in Perſon, and Receive his Son upon the Way; which the People look'd upon as an Earneſt of Greater Bleſſings to ſee the Father and his Two Sons brought together by ſo Auſpicious a Providence.

Some few days after This, the Senate having reſolv'd upon Two ſeveral Triumphs apart; One for the Father, the Other for the Son, in Honour of their Illuſtrious Atchievements; Veſpaſian, and Titus, This Decree notwithſtanding, declar'd themſelves for Contracting Both Triumphs into One. Upon the Day of the Solemnity, there was not a Creature in That Populous City that did not put in for a Spectator: inſomuch that when they were all plac'd, there was hardly Paſſage for the Emperours. The Soldiers, with their Officers in the Head of them, march'd in very Good Order, before Day, up to the Gates to wait the Coming of the Princes; not the Upper-Palace Gates, but Thoſe near the Temple of Iſis; where Theſe Heroes took up their Lodging That Night. At break of Day, Veſpaſian and Titus ſtood forth, and advanced, with Laurel-Crowns upon their Heads, and Purple Robes, after the Manner of their Country, to the Octavian Walks, where the Senate, the Nobility, and the Roman Knights waited for them. There was a Tribunal Erected before the Portal, with Ivory Seats upon it, which they mounted; and ſitting down, were there ſaluted with the Harangues and Acclamations of the Whole

Two Triumphs Contracted into One.

The Order, the Curioſity, and the Magnificence of the Triumph.

Whole Field. They were Unarm'd, and as I ſaid, Crown'd with Laurels, and Cloth'd with Purple. As they were going-on, and amplifying upon the Emperour's Praiſes, Veſpaſian made them a Sign of Silence: and then when All things were Huſh and Quiet, Cæſar ſtood-up; and Covering Part of his Head with his Garment, paſs'd certain Ejaculatory Vows and Prayers according to Cuſtom; and Titus did the like. Veſpaſian, after This, gave the Whole Auditory a ſhort Speech; and ſo ſent away the Soldiers to Dinner; who were in Courſe to be Entertain'd at the Emperor's Charge. He went next to the Triumphal Gate, (together with Titus) ſo call'd from the Triumphal Pomp paſſing That way; and then taking their Repaſts, and putting-on their Triumphal Habits, they Sacrific'd to their Gods in the Gate, and ſo led-on the Triumph through the middle of the Spectacles for the Better View of the People, and the Greater Glory of the Solemnity.

The Magnificence and the Variety of Theſe Shews is not ſo much as to be imagin'd, and much leſs Expreſs'd; whether for the Nicety of Workmanſhip, Value, or Novelty: for the Whole Stock of Precious and Agreeable Rarities, that the Happyeſt of Nations had been ſo many Ages a gathering, met all together in This One Day's Triumph, to the Honour of the Tranſcendent Dignity of the Roman Empire. As for the Choiceſt Works that ever were ſeen or heard of, in Gold, Silver, or Ivory; for Price, or Excellency; they were here ſo Common and Frequent, that they look'd liker a Natural Confuſion of Things, then any Part of a Regulated Pomp. And then for the Admirable Variety of Purples, and Babylonian Embroideries, Jewels, and Precious Stones; ſome Enchaſed into Golden Crowns, and ſome ſet-out with Other Phancies, they were here ſo Familiar, that they ſeem'd to be no longer a Curioſity. They had the Images of their Gods alſo that were Every way Wonderful, both for Size, Art, and Matter: and likewiſe the Figures of ſeveral ſorts of Living Creatures dreſs'd up ſuitably to their Kind. They had alſo a vaſt Number of People to carry all This, in Cloth of Gold and Purple: and All Thoſe that were ſet apart for the Service of the Pomp, had their Diſtinguiſhing Ornaments of Splendour and State. Nay the Common ſort of the very Priſoners Themſelves, were not without ſomewhat that was Graceful in their Habit to diſguiſe the Miſery of their Condition, and the Marks of Slavery that they wore in their Faces. But nothing was more to be Admir'd then the Ordering of their Machines, and how the Bearers were able to ſupport them; being many of them Three or Four Stories High. And the Coſt was Anſwerable to the Artifice; for the Hangings and the Furniture were all Wrought with Gold, Ivory, and the like. There were alſo ſuch Repreſentations of War, and the Circumſtances that attend it, that nothing was ever more to the Life. Here was in One Place the Figure of a Fruitful Country laid Waſt; in Another, Whole Armies cut to pieces: ſome Flying; Others Purſuing, or Taken Priſoners: Strong Walls Batter'd to the Ground; Forts Demoliſh'd; Breaches made in Fortify'd Cities; Towns taken by Aſſault; the Streets running Bloud, and the Conquer'd begging Quarter; Temples Burning; Houſes beaten down upon the Heads of their Maſters; Rivers lamenting their Misfortune, that inſtead of Watering and Refreſhing Fields and Meadows, and ſupplying Drink to Man and Beaſt, they find themſelves forc'd to take their Courſe through Publique Conflagrations. What was all This now, but a Lively Image of the Sufferings of the Jews; and ſo put together by Art and Phancy, that it may paſs for an Inſtructive Hiſtory of the Ruine of That Famous City to Thoſe that never knew more of it?

Upon Every One of the Pageants was Repreſented the Governour of the Place that was taken, and the Manner of taking it. The Shipping came next; and then the Spoils that were diſpers'd up and down in ſever Places. But the moſt Conſiderable Pieces, were the Golden Table and the Golden Candleſtick that were taken out of the Temple of Jeruſalem: the Former weighing ſeveral Talents, and the Other not apply'd to the Uſe it was intended for. There was a kind of a Pillar that came out of the Foot of it; and out of That Pillar, as from the Stem of a Tree, Seven Branches, and Every Branch having at the Top the Reſemblance of a Lamp: the Number of Seven intimating the Veneration the Jews have for their Seventh Day. After This, came the Jews Law, which was the Laſt Trophee of their Conqueſts that the Romans Expos'd. This was follow'd by Certain Images of Victory wrought out of Ivory and Gold. And laſt of all, to bring up the Rear, came Veſpaſian Himſelf, with Titus in the Next Place, and Domitian along with them on Horſeback, Well-Mounted, and well becoming the Dignity of his Station. So they march'd together into the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there finiſh'd the Triumph.

The Triumph Concluded in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

Being

Being now come to Jupiter's Temple, they made ſome little Stay there; it being according to Ancient Practice ſo to do upon the like Occaſion: till News ſhould be brought them that their Enemies General was Dead. This General was Simon Gioras (one of the Priſoners that was led in Triumph:) who was drawn through the Market-Place with a Rope about his Neck, and put to death by Thoſe that drew him, according to the Roman Law and Practice in the Caſe of ſuch Malefactors. Word being brought that Gioras was now Dead, the Whole Field rang with Shouts and Acclamations, and ſo they betook themſelves to their Vows and Sacrifices; and when the Solemn Part was Over, the Princes return'd to the Palace, where they made a Mighty Treat: and there was nothing elſe all over the Town but Feaſting, Rejoycing, and giving Thanks for the Final Victory they had obtain'd over their Enemies, to the Glory of their Generals, and the Moral Aſſurance of a Publique Repoſe.

The Death of Simon Gioras.

When Theſe Triumphs were over, and the Empire ſettled, Veſpaſian Erected a Temple that he Dedicated to Peace. It was as Rich as Hands and Expence could make it, and the Diſpatch of it, in ſo ſhort a time, was little leſs then a Miracle. He ſpar'd for no Coſt: over and above a Collection of the Choiceſt Curioſities in Painting and Sculpture to Adorn it, inſomuch that People flock'd from all Quarters of the World to ſee the Glory and the Order of this Admirable Structure. In This Temple he depoſited the Golden Table and the Candleſtick, as the Rarities he valued moſt. And for the Jews Law, and the Purples belonging to the Sanctuary, they were lodg'd with Great Care and Reverence in the Palace.

The Situation of Machærus. Herod *the Great runs up a Wall and Turrets about it. When Lucilius Baſſus had his Commiſſion from Cæſar for Lieutenant General of Judæa, he took upon him the Command of the Army from Cerealis Vetilianus, and made himſelf Maſter of the Caſtle of Herodion by Compoſition. After This, he drew his Troups together that lay ſcatter'd up and down, propounding, with the Help of the Tenth Legion, to reduce Machærus, as a Thing abſolutely Neceſſary to be done; for the Strength of That Place would be a Dangerous Encouragement to a Rebellion: and as the Situation of it gave Confidence to the Town; ſo it ſtruck an Awe, on the Other hand, upon him that ſhould attempt it.

The Situation of Machærus.

The Mountain that Machærus ſtands upon is prodigiouſly High and Rocky, to the degree of being almoſt Impregnable. But Nature hath made it well nigh Inacceſſible too, by encloſing it with Valleys, that are neither to be paſſed, nor to be fill'd up: and ſo Deep likewiſe, that it turns a Body's Brain to look down at them. It reaches to the Weſtward Sixty Furlongs in Length, and borders upon the Lake Aſphaltitis; and the Caſtle hath an Unbounded Proſpect over all That Quarter. On the South and North, it is Encompaſs'd with Valleys of the ſame Dimenſions, and as ſecure from any Attempt as the Other. The Depth upon the Eaſt is at leaſt a Hundred Cubits, and reaches to the Mountain that is over-againſt Machærus.

Alexander, the King of the Jews, was the Firſt that Fortify'd This Place, and rais'd a Caſtle upon it; which Gabinius afterwards demomoliſh'd in his War with Ariſtobulus; and then Herod the Great found it ſo well worth his Care too, eſpeciall againſt his Neighbours the Arabians, who lay ſo conveniently to do him Miſchief, that he ran a Subſtantial Wall about it with Strong Turrets; Erecting alſo a Fair City there, which he cauſed to be Peopled, and from thence carry'd a Paſſage up to the Caſtle it ſelf. This Caſtle he Encompaſs'd at the Top with Another Wall, and Turrets at the Corners, of Sixty Cubits in Height; and in the Middle of All, he Rais'd a Large Beautiful Palace, which was abundantly ſupply'd with Water from ſeveral Ciſterns, wherever there was Occaſion for it: as if Nature and Art had been at ſtrife, which of the Two ſhould outdo the Other; the One by Situation, the Other by Emprovement. He likewiſe furniſhed This Caſtle with ſo Plentiful a Magazine of Arms, Arrows, Machines, and all ſorts of Proviſions, both for War and Mouth, that the Garriſon ſhould never need to Fear either Force, or Famine.

There

There was in This Palace a Plant they call Rue; of ſo Wonderful a Growth, that it was as Tall and as Well-ſpred as any Fig-Tree. It had been There, they ſay, ever ſince the Days of Herod, and might have continu'd longer, if the Jews had not Rooted it up upon taking the Place. Of the Plants Rue and Baaras.

In the Valley, on the North-ſide of Machærus call'd Baaras, there grows alſo a Plant of the ſame Name. (a) It is in Appearance of a Flame-Colour; and toward the Evening it caſts a Light like the Beams of the Sun. The Root is not Eaſily pluckt-up; but it draws back if any Body offers at it: and the Only way to fix it, is to Sprinkle it with the Urine of a Woman, or a little Menſtruous Bloud. And when all This is done, it is yet Certain Death to touch it, without a Piece of the Root in your Hand: though they talk of Another way alſo of doing it without Danger, and it is This. They dig round about the Root till it is laid almoſt Bare, and then tie a Dog to the Remaining Part of it. The Dog's Maſter that tied him there, goes his Way; and the Dog following him, draweth the Root after, and dies immediately, as if it were to Redeem his Maſter. When it has been once deliver'd, this Root may be Handled as ſecurely as any other Plant; but it has One Quality after all, that does more then Countervail This Difficulty. For the Spirits that we call Devils, are only the Souls of Wicked Men, that have gotten Poſſeſſion of Living Bodies, and would undoubtedly deſtroy them if they were not prevented. Now This Plant is a Sure Remedy againſt Theſe Obſeſſions, and the very Touching of the Patient with it, Cures him.

In the ſame Place there is a Wonderful Diverſity of Springs and Fountains of very Differing Qualities and Taſts, as Hot, Bitter, Sweet, &c. And there are alſo Cold Springs intermingled One with Another in the Lower Ground: But That which is moſt Wonderful, is a Shallow-Cave there at hand with a Rocky Stone over it, and the Figure of Two Breaſts, like Two Fountains, coming out of it: the One Diſcharging Hot Waters; and the Other, Cold: and they make Both together a moſt Agreeable Bath, which Cures many Diſeaſes, and eſpecially Thoſe of the Nerves. There are Mines alſo of Sulphur and Alume. A Strange Variety of Springs and Fountains.

Baſſus, upon a Full View of Machærus, came to a Reſolution of laying Siege to the Place; propoſing to Himſelf the Filling up of the Vally to the Eaſt of the Town, and the Advancing of his Approaches That way. The Firſt Thing he did, was to run-up a Mount againſt the Caſtle, with all poſſible ſpeed, as the moſt likely way to Facilitate the Attempt: The Jews of the Place divided themſelves from the Stranger-Jews, and turn'd them off as a Pittiful ſort of People, into the Lower-City, to Stand the Firſt Shock; while They Themſelves took Charge of the Caſtle, not only as the Stronger and more Defenſible of the Two, but as a Place where they might make Better Terms with the Romans in caſe of the Worſt. They had a mind to try however what might be done to divert the Siege; and there paſs'd not a Day without Reſolute Sallies and Skirmiſhes, and a Conſiderable Loſs of Men on Both ſides: ſometimes One getting the Better of it, and ſometimes the Other: the Jews, when they fell upon the Romans by ſurprize; and the Romans, when they were aware of the Jews coming, and provided for them. But the Siege was not to go-off ſo; for there happen'd a ſurprizing Accident that put the Jews upon an Abſolute Neceſſity of giving up the Caſtle. Baſſus Beſieges Machærus. The Jews of the Place Defend the Caſtle, and the Strangers the Lower Town. Daily Skirmiſhes.

There was in the Place a Bold, an Enterprizing, and a Daring Young Man, whoſe Name was Eleazar. This Eleazar made ſeveral Vigorous Sallies, and did all that was poſſible, both by his Council, and Example, to Obſtruct the Progreſs of the Romans, and to put a Check to their Undertakings: inſomuch, that he made himſelf a Terrour to his Enemies, as well as a Comfort and Support to his Friends: being the Firſt Man ſtill upon all Encounters, to come-on; and the Laſt, in caſe of a Retreat, that came-off. There paſs'd a Skirmiſh One Day, and when the Action was over, and Both Parties withdrawn, Eleazar, in a Vain-Glorious Contempt of Danger, or of any Man that ſhould dare to Attaque him, made a Stop without the Gate, and fell into a Careleſs Diſcourſe with ſome of the Defendents upon the Walls, without Heeding any thing Elſe. This being within View of the Roman Camp; and One Rufus an Ægyptian, and a Soldier, ſpying the Opportunity, ran-in upon him at Unawares; ſeiz'd him, and carry'd him off, Arms and all, into the Enemy's Quarter. Baſſus preſently order'd him to be Stript, and Publiquely Whipt at his Length upon the Ground in ſight of the City. The Jews were ſo Confounded at the Calamity of This Young Man, that the Whole Multitude brake out into Tears and Exclamations in Pity of his Diſtreſs. When Baſſus found the Generality of the People ſo Paſſionately Concern'd for the Misfortune of One Man, he computed with Himſelf, that, if he could but Enflame the Compaſſion, he might gain his Point, A Bold and Memorable Action of Eleazar's. and work them to a Compoſition of giving up the Place to ſave Eleazar's Life. This Phancy ſucceeded to his Wiſh: for upon the ſetting up of a Croſs, as if Eleazar were to be forthwith Crucify'd, the Timber was no ſooner Planted, but the Garriſon brake out into an Outcry with One Voice, That their Affliction was altogether Intolerable. Eleazar begg'd of them, upon This, to Conſider both His Caſe, who was now to Dye a Wretched Death, and their Own; and not to Contend any longer with the Courage and Fortune of the Romans, ſince the Whole World had already ſubmitted it ſelf to Their Empire.

This Submiſſion and Supplication of Eleazar's, together with the Powerful Interceſſions of his Friends and Relations in the Caſtle (for his Family and Intereſt was very Conſiderable) ſoften'd the Defendents into ſuch a Tenderneſs, upon Second Thoughts, that they ſent Deputies immediately to the Romans, with Propoſals to deliver-up the Caſtle, upon Condition of Diſcharging Eleazar, and leaving the Garriſon at liberty to go whither they would. Baſſus made no Difficulty of the Terms; but the People of the Lower-Town taking it Ill that an Agreement ſhould be made without their Privity, reſolved among Themſelves to ſlip away That Night by Stealth. Upon the Opening of the Gates, Baſſus had notice of it from the Caſtle, partly, out of Envy to their Companions, and partly, out of Fear for Themſelves, leſt They ſhould be thought of the Party. But the Braveſt however of Thoſe that went firſt, got-off; and the reſt to the Number of Seventeen Hundred Men, were put to the Sword: the Women and the Children made Slaves. Not but that Baſſus yet made good his Articles in the diſmiſſing of the Garriſon, and ſetting Eleazar Free.

Baſſus beſets the Jews in the Forreſt of Jardes.

SO ſoon as This was over, Baſſus made all the Haſt he could with his Army to the Forreſt of Jardes, upon Intelligence, that Great Numbers of Jews, who had made their Eſcape from the Siege of Jeruſalem and Machærus, were gather'd together there; and when he came upon the Place, he found it to be True: ſo that the Firſt Thing he did was to beſet the Whole Wood with his Horſe; where he kept his Guard ſo ſtrict, that not a Jew could break thorough. He Employ'd his Foot at the ſame time to cut down the Trees and Buſhes of the Thickets where the Jews had taken Sanctuary: inſomuch, that they had now no Poſſibility left them to ſave themſelves, unleſs they could cut out their way through the Enemy's Troups, and ſo get-off. This being the Laſt Experiment they had to Truſt to, they drew all into a Body; and with an Impetuous Clamour, made one Deſperate Puſh upon Thoſe that ſurrounded them, and were as Bravely receiv'd. The Combat, in fine, betwixt the Fearleſs Temerity of the One ſide, and the Firm Courage of the Other, was Hot and Obſtinate: But in the Concluſion the Romans carry'd the Day, with the Loſs only of Twelve Kill'd, and not many Wounded: whereas, of Three Thouſand Jews, (for there were ſo many in This Action) not ſo much as One Man came-off. There was Judas alſo among the reſt, their Leader, and the (a) Son of Jair, (of whom we have ſpoken heretofore.) He had formerly a Command at the Siege of Jeruſalem, and made his Eſcape at laſt out of a Vault.

The Emperour at the ſame time wrote to his Officer Tiberius Maximus, to make Sale of all the Jews Lands; for he would not trouble himſelf with Rebuilding any other Cities, but take them all to his Own Uſe: leaving only Eight Hundred Soldiers in Emmaus, ſome (b) Sixty Furlongs from Jeruſalem; and impoſing a Tax upon Every Jew by the Poll, of Two Drachma's a Year, to be pay'd-in to the Capitol, as formerly to the Temple. Antiochus an Unfortunate Prince.

IT ſo fell out in the Fourth Year of Veſpaſian, that Antiochus the King of Comagene, with his Whole Family, fell into a moſt Deplorable Diſtreſs: and This was the Occaſion of it. Ceſennius Petus, being Governour of Syria, wrote Cæſar Word, that Antiochus and his Son Epiphanes were reſolved to go-off from the Romans; and that they had already Treated about it with the King of Parthia: inſiſting alſo upon the Neceſſity of preventing the Miſchief by Striking the Firſt Blow. For it might be enough elſe to ſet the Whole Empire in a Flame. Now whether This was Truth, or Malice, may be Another Queſtion: but whatever it was, Cæſar could not in Prudence neglect the Advice; either in reſpect of the Neighbourhood of Thoſe Two Kings, which made the Caſe ſtill more Dangerous, or in regard that Samoſata being the Capital City of Comagene, and bordering upon the Euphrates, the Parthians might paſs and repaſs at Pleaſure, and Secure themſelves of a Safe Retreat at hand.

Ceſennius Repreſents him as an Enemy to Cæſar.

Veſpaſian was ſo Poſſeſs'd with the Credit of the Story, that he left Ceſennius to his Own Diſcretion, and with a Commiſſion to do in it what he thought fit. Ceſennius loſt no time, in making the Beſt of his Deputation; for he fell immediately into Comagene, with the Sixth Legion, and ſome Companies and Squadrons, of Foot and Horſe, with Ariſtobulus the King of Chalcis, and Sohemus the King of Emeſa, to Second him; Antiochus and his Companions never ſo much as dreaming of the Matter. His Entrance was without any Oppoſition at all; for the Natives were not in Condition to Encounter him: and then for Antiochus, the News of This Incurſion was a moſt Unaccountable Surprize to him, who never had ſo much as the Leaſt Thought of a Miſunderſtanding with the Romans. The Reſolution he took in This Difficulty, was to leave the Kingdom juſt as it ſtood at That Inſtant, and to take his Wife and Children along with him as an Inſtance of his Good Faith to the Empire, and likewiſe as a Pregnant Proof of his Innocence. Hereupon he withdrew about a Hundred and Thirty Furlongs from the City, and Encamped upon a Plain. Ceſennius, in the mean time, ſends Soldiers to take Poſſeſſion of Samoſata, and to keep Garriſon there; while He Himſelf, with Other Troups, Marches away after Antiochus. But all This Violence and Injuſtice was not ſufficient yet to provoke the King to any Unfriendly Act againſt the Romans: or to do any thing more then to lament his Hard Fortune, and to bear all Things with Patience.

Ceſennius makes an Incurſion into Comagene.

His Two Sons, Epiphanes, and Callinicus, gave the Romans Battle.

But for his Sons, Epiphanes, and Callinicus, that were Youthful, Martial, and Brave; They could not in Honour but betake themſelves to their Arms: ſo that drawing out what Strength they were able to make, they gave the Romans Battle; fought it out all Day, and in the End ſhew'd a Conduct anſwerable to their Valour; for they came-off with very Little Loſs.

Antiochus Retires into Cilicia. And the Brothers ſhift for themſelves.

The Fortune of This Day was Favourable to Antiochus; but all too Little to put a Stop to the Retreat he had reſolv'd upon; for he took his Wife and Daughters away with him into Cilicia: and This Scrupulous Integrity of his went ſo far, that it had like to have broken the Hearts of his Soldiers. For what could they Hope for, they ſaid, when the King Himſelf Deſpair'd; deſerting their Prince in That Diſtraction, and going over to the Romans. All that Epiphanes and his Brother had now to do, was to ſave Themſelves before it was too Late. And ſo with Eight Horſemen more, (Ten in all) they paſs'd the Euphrates, (where they were now Secure) in their way to Vologeſes the King of Parthia. This Generous Prince, upon their Arrival, did not Treat them like Fugitives, but with That Royal State and Reſpect that became their Birth and Quality.

Ceſennius Orders Antiochus to be ſent Priſoner to Rome.

Antiochus being now come to Tarſus in Cilicia, Ceſennius ſent an Officer to take him into Cuſtody, and carry him Bound to Rome. But Veſpaſian was too Generous to Treat a Crowned Head at That rate, and choſe rather to ſhew a Reſpect to the Memory of an Ancient Friendſhip, then to Revenge himſelf for a Suppoſed Injury: Wherefore he Order'd his Chains to be taken-off upon the way; His Journy to Rome

Veſpaſian Cauſes his Chains to be taken off: and Treats Him with all Manner of Reſpect.

Reſpited, and Himſelf to make ſome Stay at Lacedæmon; where Veſpaſian furniſh'd him with Proviſions of Mony, ſuitable to the Dignity of a Royal Expence.

This Frank and Honourable way of Proceeding toward Antiochus did not only deliver the Brothers from the Dread and Anxiety they were in for Fear of their Father; but put them in Hopes even of a Reconciliation to Cæſar Himſelf; eſpecially upon the Interceſſion of Vologeſes, that they might be permitted to go to Rome, and Cæſar to give way to it: For though they were very Eaſy as it was, they had no Patience yet to live out of the Pale of the Empire. They came-on, in fine, to Rome, and their Father was brought thither ſoon after, where they were all Three Entertain'd with High Demonſtrations of Affection and Eſteem.

The Father and the Two Sons Conducted to Rome, and Highly Entertain'd.

The People now known by the Name of Alanes, formerly call'd Scythians; having their Habitations, as we have ſaid elſewhere, near the River Tanais, and the Lake of Mæotis; Joyn'd in a Confederacy with the King of Hyrcania, to break into Media, and lay the Land Waſt: This King being the Maſter of the Only Paſſage into That Country; which, they ſay, Alexander ſo Order'd, as to have it ſhut up with Iron Gates. This Paſs being now lay'd Open, they poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Place, without either Suſpicion, or Reſiſtance, and carry'd off a Booty, in Goods and Cattel, to a Mighty Value. This Inroad put Pacorus (then King of the Place) into ſuch a Fright, that he left his Eſtate at Mercy; and Flying for his Own Safety into Craggs and Strong-Holds, he made a Shift at laſt to Redeem his Wife and Concubines for a Hundred Talents. At This rate they preſs'd forward, ſpoiling and making Havock all the way they went, without the leaſt reſiſtance, up to the Borders of Armenia; Tyridates being at That time King there. This Tyridates puſh'd-up to them, and fought them, and was within a very little of being taken Alive in the Battle; by the Nooſe of a Halter that was thrown over his Head in the Action; but in the very Moment while they were drawing him off, he cut the Rope with his Sword, and got away. The Succeſs of This Combat made Theſe Barbarians more Bloudy and Inſolent then before; inſomuch that they depopulated all, wherever they came, and carry'd-off a World of Men and Cattle along with them to their Own Homes.

And carry off a Vaſt Booty.

Baſſus was now Dead in Judæa, and Flavius Silva his Succeſſor in the Government; who, finding the Whole Country to be reduc'd, ſaving only One Rebellious Caſtle, drew-out all the Force he was able to make, with a Reſolution to Attacque it. The Caſtle's Name was Maſſada; and One Eleazar Commanded it, the Ring-leader of the Sicarii, or Cut-Throats; who had got into Poſſeſſion of it. This Eleazar was deſcended from one Judas, who, as we have ſaid already, was the Man that moſt violently oppos'd the Jews Entring their Names upon the Roll, when Cyrenius Executed the Office of Cenſor in Judæa. This Faction of the Sicarii were profeſs'd Enemies to all that ſhew'd any manner of Reſpect to the Romans: and they Treated them alſo like Enemies, even to the Degree of Pillaging their Goods; driving away their Cattle, and Burning their Houſes. For what are Theſe Men Better then Strangers, ſaid they, that betray the Liberty of their Country for want of Fighting for it, and had rather live Slaves then Freemen; notwithſtanding that Freedom is a Bleſſing can never be bought too dear? Were it not Better for ſuch Men as Theſe, they cry'd, to join barefac'd with the Romans? But Theſe were only Words of Courſe, for a Blind to their Inhumanity and Avarice; as moſt evidently appear'd in the Concluſion. For when Thoſe very Men whom they branded with Perfidy and Cowardice came to join in the Revolt, and in the Common Cauſe againſt the Romans,

The Caſtle of Maſſada: and Eleazar the Governour of it.

Romans, they were Worſe Us'd then before: eſpecially Theſe that laid open the Hypocriſy of their Pretenſions, and the Iniquity of their Practice.

There was never ſuch an Age certainly ſince the Creation for all manner of Impiety, as This Juncture among the Jews. They left no New Wickedneſs to be either Done, or Thought of, or for Invention it ſelf to work upon. Never ſuch an Agreement, Publique and Private, in all ſorts of Corruptions: Never ſuch an Æmulation, in all Things that were Ill, who ſhould Outdo the Other: Men in Power oppreſs'd the Common People; and the Common People were as ſharp again upon Men in Power; the One for Dominion, the Other for Pillage. The Lewdeſt Age ſince the Creation.

The Sicarii were the Firſt that led the way to This Licentious Courſe of Bloud and Violence, without ſlipping any Opportunity, either by Word or Deed, of doing Miſchief where they were ſet upon it. But all This was not a Flea-biting to the Extravagant Cruelties of John: who did not only put Particular Men to Death, as Common Enemies (Citizens eſpecially) for preſuming to adviſe Things Neceſſary and Profitable for the Publique; but Multiply'd all manner of Outrages alſo upon his Conntry. And who could Expect Better from a Man that made no Conſcience of Affronting God Himſelf? as in the Uſe of Forbidding Meats; renouncing the Purity of his Profeſſion, and departing from the Laws and Cuſtoms of our Forefathers. What wonder now, to ſee a Man Inhumane to his Neighbour, that has no more Reverence for his Maker! The Siccarii led the Way. But John of Giſchala outdid Them all.

And ſo for Simon the Son of Gioras, what Villany was not That Man Guilty of? What Barbarities did he not Inflict upon the very Men that Rais'd him? Thoſe, that of Freemen Born, made Themſelves His Slaves! The Natural Ties of Bloud and Friendſhip had no Other Effect upon This ſort of People, then to Enflame them to the Execution of more Horrid Butcheries. They look'd upon it as a Mean, and a kind of Scandalous Inſolence to Tyrannize over Strangers, compar'd with the more Generous and Heroical Bravery of Trampling upon their Own Fleſh and Bloud. The Barbarous Cruelties of Simon.

And the Idumæans came not much behind them neither; Thoſe Bloudy Miſcreants, that after the Aſſaſſinating of the High-Prieſts, to cut-off, as much as in Them lay, the Whole Frame and Order of Religion at a Blow, confounded likewiſe the Polity of the City, without leaving ſo much as the Face of Juſtice or a Civil Government; and ſetting-up Tyranny and Oppreſſion in the Stead of it. This was the Province of Thoſe they call Zelotes, and they had given themſelves a Title to the Name by their Works; as the moſt Paſſionate Patrons and Promoters of Vice and Lewdneſs upon the Face of the Earth; though under the Colour of Piety and Virtue; but Seducing Thoſe they would impoſe upon by Fallacies and Falſe Lights, and at the ſame time turning Evil into Good, and Good into Evil. The Idumæans Inhumane and Bloudy. The Zelotes the Wickedeſt.

They had at laſt, however, the End they deſerv'd, in the Manifeſtation of God's Juſt Vengeance upon them: for they ſuffer'd all the Calamities and Torments that it is poſſible for Fleſh and Bloud to Undergo; and This throughout the whole Courſe of their Lives. And the moſt Miſerable of Mortals.

It will be ſaid perhaps that the Puniſhment fell ſhort of the Offence. And it may be Anſwer'd, that no Puniſhment could come up to't. But This is not a Time or Place to Enter upon the Hiſtory of Thoſe Unhappy Creatures that fell into the Hands of Theſe Monſters: ſo that I ſhall rather return to my Relation, and go-on where I left.

Silva the Roman General was now upon his March to beſiege Maſſada, where there was a Garriſon of the Sicarii under the Command of Eleazar; who was the Head of That Party. He made ſure of the Country about it, without much Difficulty; ſettled his Garriſons, as he ſaw Convenient; and ran-up a Wall about the Caſtle to prevent Excurſions or Eſcapes, and to ſecure his Guards. He made Choice of a Quarter for his Camp, that he found moſt Commodious for his Purpoſe: That is to ſay, upon the joyning of the Caſtle-Rock to the Next Mountain: only Proviſions were extremely ſcarce, for they were brought a great way, and with much Trouble to the Jews, whoſe Bus'neſs it was to ſupply them; beſide the bringing of Water Another Way too, for there was no Fountain near the Place. A Garriſon of the Sicarii in Maſſada, under Eleazar.

Matters being Thus Order'd, Silva diſpos'd himſelf to the Siege, which was like to be a Work of Time and Labour, as will appear by the Situation of the Caſtle. It ſtands upon a Large High Rock, with Deep and Craggy Precipices round about it: and there is no Diſcerning the Bottom from above by reaſon of Other Rocks that interpoſe, and Cover it. The Acceſs is ſo Difficult, that even the Beaſts Themſelves cannot Climb it, ſaving only by Two Paſſages: One to the Eaſtward from the Lake Aſphaltitis, which is very Nice and Dangerous; the Other from the Weſt, which is the more Practicable of the Two. They call one of them by the Name of the Snake, from the ſeveral Windings and Turnings in the Aſcent: for the Rocks Silva Beſieges it. The Situation of Maſſada.

in many Places double upon Themſelves, and run In and Out ſo, that People are fain to go back and forward to paſs them. And the Paſſages are ſo Narrow likewiſe, that there's no Walking upon them but by Standing upon One Foot while you Advance the Other: beſide that One Slip, or a Falſe Step is Certain Death; for it drops you into a Precipice that gives a Man a Horrour but to think of it. They reckon Thirty Furlongs of This Way from the Bottom to the Top of the Mountain, which brings you into a Plain, where Jonathan the High-Prieſt Erected a Caſtle, and called it Maſſada; He Himſelf being the Firſt Founder of it. Herod the Great ſpared afterwards for no Coſt or Care to Adorn and Fortify it. He carry'd a Wall about it, of Seven Stadia in Compaſs; all of Curious White Stone, Twelve Cubits High, and Eight Over. He built likewiſe Twenty Seven Turrets; Each of Fifty Cubits in Height: and Theſe Towers Entertain'd a Communication with All the Buildings on the Inſide of the Wall. The Plain above was ſo Well Condition'd, and ſo Fruitful a Soil, that Herod Order'd it to be ſet apart for Tillage; to the End that whoever ſhould take Sanctuary in That Caſtle, he might be ſure not to want Neceſſaries. He cauſed alſo a Royal and a Stately Palace to be built for Himſelf within the Compaſs of the Caſtle: The Entrance fronting Weſtward, and bending a little to the North. The Walls of it were very High and Strong, with Four Towers in the Four Corners, each of Sixty Cubits High. The Apartments, Galleries, and Baths, were for Variety, Ornament, and Contrivance, very Rich and Glorious: and all ſupported with Pillars, each of One Entire Stone; and ſo Maſterly put together, that nothing could be more ſubſtantial. The Walls and the Pavement were all Chequer'd with Party-Colour'd Stone. To Every Quarter about This Palace; the Plain above; and before the Turrets, there were a great many Large Ciſterns hew'd out of the Rock for the Preſerving of Water; ſo that Theſe Veſſels abundantly ſupply the Want of Fountains. There was a Way alſo cut under Ground, from the Palace up to the Caſtle, which was not to be Diſcover'd from without; and the Other was effectually Impaſſable, as we have ſaid already. But for the Weſtern Paſs, there was a Tower ſet up in the Narroweſt Part of it, a matter of a Thouſand Cubits from the Caſtle, that quite blockt it up. Not but that the Attempt would have been Difficult enough, even without any Oppoſition: but This is to ſhew the State and Condition of the Place, both by Art and Nature.

The State and Condition of Maſſada, both by Art, and Nature.

Stored with all Manner of Proviſions.

Now This Caſtle was not only provided againſt Force and Stratagem, but againſt the very Dint of Famine too: For there was Corn in it, Wine, Oyl, all ſorts of Pulſe, Dates, &c. for many Years; which was all found in it, when Eleazar with his Sicarii ſurpriz'd it: and it was all as Freſh and Sound too, (though a Hundred Years Depoſited) as if it had been but newly laid up. And perhaps the Purity of the Air, at That Height, abſtracted from Groſs and Fæculent Vapours might be the Reaſon of it.

There was alſo a Magazine of all ſorts of Arms for Ten Thouſand Men, ſtor'd there by the King's Order; a Great Quantity of Unwrought Iron, Braſs, Lead, and the like; which we may preſume was prepar'd for ſome Great Deſign.

Herod Intended it for a Retreat in Caſe of Need.

There goes a Tradition, that Herod finding himſelf upon a Pinch under Two Difficulties, provided This Caſtle for his Retreat in Caſe of need: the One was for Fear the People ſhould Depoſe him, and ſet the Aſamonian Family upon the Throne again; The Other was a Matter of a more Dangerous Conſequence. Cleopatra the Queen of Ægypt had a Deſign, it ſeems, upon the Life of Herod: and ſhe made no Secret of it neither; but Own'd the Thing, and had ſeveral Diſcourſes with Antony about it; preſſing him that Herod might be Diſpatch'd out of the way, and ſhe her ſelf made Queen of the Jews in his ſtead. It was a Wonder that the Paſſion Antony had for Cleopatra could deny her any thing; but Herod however, upon This Apprehenſion, put Maſſada into ſuch a Condition, that there was hardly any thought of taking it; and the Romans could never be Abſolute Maſters of the Jews without it.

The Jews being now ſo Cloſe Wall'd-up in Maſſada, that there was no Poſſibility, as I ſaid before, of their Eſcaping, Silva advanc'd with his Machines; there being but One Place that he could fill-up to raiſe a Mount upon. For beyond That Tower that blocks-up the way upon the Weſt, to the Palace and Caſtle, there was a Large Long Rock call'd Leuce: Larger then That the Caſtle ſtood upon; but not ſo High by Three Hundred Cubits as Maſſada. The General had no ſooner gain'd This Rock, but he ſet his Soldiers at Work to advance a Mount upon it; and they wrought ſo hard, that they carry'd it up to the Height of Two Hundred Cubits: which not being as yet ſtrong enough to ſupport the Engines, they rais'd a kind of Platform upon it, wrought with Great Stones; Fifty Cubits High, and as much over.

He gains the Rock Leuce.

over. But beſide Theſe Ordinary Machines, they had Others alſo of the Invention of Veſpaſian, but Emprov'd afterwards by Titus. They Erected further upon This Platform, a Tower of Sixty Cubits, all Fortify'd with Iron.

The Romans from This Turret, gall'd the Defendents with their Stones and Arrows to ſuch a degree, that they durſt not ſhew their Heads upon the Walls. Silva, in the mean time, kept battering the Wall with a moſt Prodigious Ram; which by little and little made ſome ſmall Impreſſion upon it. But the Sicarii quickly ſupply'd That Defect by Clapping-up Another Wall behind it that fear'd no Machines; for the Matter of it being ſoft and yielding, it Deaded the Stroke: and the Manner of the Structure was This. They took Two Rows of Large Timbers, and Mortiſs'd them one into another. They were Both of a Size, and together with a ſpace left betwixt them, juſt anſwer'd the Thickneſs of the Wall. This Space they fill'd with a kind of Clayiſh Earth, and nail'd up Boards a-croſs the Frame to keep the Earth from falling down. So that it ſtood as Firm as the Wall of a Houſe, and the more it was Batter'd the Stronger it was, as if it had been Ram'd and Conſolidated into a Better State of Defence.

Silva's Batteries being Defeated, he Tries Fire, and ſets all in a Flame.

When Silva found his Engines Defeated, he reſolv'd to attempt That by Fire, which he could not Compaſs by Battery; and ſo Order'd his Soldiers to try what might be done by Brands-Ends, and Fire-Works, toward the Deſtroying of their Defences. Their New Wall being moſt of it Timber-Work, and Hollow, took Fire immediately, and burſt out into a Mighty Flame: which began with the Wind on the North, and beat ſo Terribly upon the Romans, that they almoſt deſpair'd of ſaving their Machines. But the Wind luckily chopping about all on a ſudden into the South, drove ſo Furiouſly upon the Wall, that it ſet All in a Flame from Top to Bottom. The Romans were ſo ſenſible of God's appearing in their Favour, that they return'd Chearfully to their Camp, with a Full Reſolution to make an Attaque upon the Enemy the Next Morning by Peep of Day; and to keep Strong Watches in the mean while that they might not get-off in the Night.

But Eleazar had no thought of Starting, Himſelf, or of ſuffering any of his People ſo to do. The Wall however being Conſum'd to the Ground, and no Hope or Poſſibility left of Safety or Relief, the Only Brave Thing they had before them was to Conſider how they might deliver their Wives and Children from the Ignominious Outrages they might expect from the Romans, whenever they came to be Maſters of the Place. Eleazar Concluded, upon the Ballancing of This Queſtion, that a Glorious Death was infinitely to be Preferr'd to a Life of Infamy; and that the moſt Generous Reſolution they could take in the World, would be not to Outlive their Liberties. This being his Own Opinion, he call'd together the moſt Courageous of his Friends and Companions; and did what he could, by Reaſon, and Exhortation, to Diſcourſe Them into the ſame Mind.

Eleazar's Diſcourſe upon the Contempt of Death.

It is no New Thing, ſays he, my Generous Friends, for our People to Diſclaim any Other Lord and Maſter, then the True and Sovereign Lord and Maſter of the Univerſe, God Himſelf; and This without Exception to the Romans, or to any Other Nation Whatſoever. The Time is now at hand to make good our Words by our Deeds: wherefore let us Act like Our ſelves now. We have hitherto run all Hazards to preſerve Our Freedoms; but we are at preſent threaten'd with Chains, and the Worſt of Torments together, if we fall Alive into our Enemies Hands: As the Firſt that fell-off from them, and the Laſt that ſtood-out againſt them. The Matter duly Conſider'd, we are to look upon it as a Singular Grace and Favour from above, to be left ſtill at Liberty to Chuſe Our Death: a Bleſſing deny'd to many that are gone before us. We are Certain to be all Slaves to morrow, if we do not prevent it by ſetting Our ſelves Free This very Night: and it is not in the Power of our Enemies to hinder it. Neither is there any thing they deſire more, then to take us Alive; and it is now too Late to think of Contending any further. Something might have been done at Firſt perhaps, if the Aſſertors of our Liberties had but duly conſider'd Things. For they would have found that if God had not caſt us-off, though formerly his Choſen People, he would never have Expos'd Us to what we have ſuffer'd, both by our Own Diviſions, and from our Enemies; the Deſtruction of ſo many of our Principal Men, and the Whole City it ſelf laid Waſt with Fire and Sword. But how comes it at laſt that we Alone are the Men of the Whole Nation to ſtand-up for our Liberties, as if we our ſelves were Innocent of Thoſe Iniquities that we have Taught to Others? You ſee by This time the Vanity of your Extravagant Hopes, and the Miſery of your Diſappointments. And what are we the Better here for an Impregnable Caſtle, with an Ample Proviſion of Arms, and All Neceſſaries for our ſupport, when God hath manifeſtly doom'd us to Deſtruction? What do you think of That Judicial Wind and Fire, that left the Romans to Conſume Us and Our New Wall? Did it do This of its Own Accord, do ye think; or was it not rather an Inflidion upon us for the Crying Sins we had been Guilty of one towards another?

A Judicial Wind and Fire.

Now ſince Our Puniſhment is Juſt, and that there is no Avoiding of it, Will it not be much more Reaſonable for Us to do Juſtice upon Our Selves, then to leave it to the Victorious Romans, as the Executors of Divine Vengeance? By This Means, We ſecure the Honour of Our Wives, and the Freedom of our Children: And next to Them, let us Honourably take our Own Turns, and Dye Free; leaving That Memorial behind us as the Beſt of Monuments But in the Firſt place, let the Caſtle be ſet on Fire, and our Own Gold and Silver melted down; for the Romans will be ſick of their Purchaſe, without the Poſſeſſion, either of our Treaſure, or of our Perſons. Let the Proviſions for the Mouth and Belly be left behind, as a Teſtimony that we were not Starved into This Condition; but kept to Our Firſt Reſolution of chuſing Death, rather then Bondage.

This was Eleazar's Speech; but it did not Relliſh with All alike: ſome were very much pleas'd with the Propoſal, and as Forward to put it in Execution; reckoning upon Death as a Deſirable State upon Thoſe Terms. Thoſe that were good-natur'd, or Tender-Hearted, had a Horrour upon them to think of taking away the Lives of their Friends, and no leſs at the Thought of laying Violent Hands upon Themſelves: and then looking Mournfully one upon another with Tears in their Eyes, they betray'd the Softneſſes of their Hearts. Eleazar was not a little Troubled at Theſe Effeminate Weakneſſes, for Fear of Staggering Others that ſeem'd well enough Reſolv'd, and calling in Queſtion the Dignity of his Propoſition. He follow'd his Point however, and went on with his Exhortation; but with Another ſort of Air and Spirit, advancing his Diſcourſe upon the Subject of the Immortality of the Soul: and fixing his Eye upon Thoſe that he ſaw in Tears, he addreſs'd himſelf That way, in a Vehement Earneſtneſs of Exclamation, and in Theſe, or the like Words.

Of the Immortality of the Soul.

I am, ſays he, wonderfully Miſtaken, I perceive, in my Opinion, that Brave Men in a Conteſt for Liberty, had rather loſe their Lives then their Cauſe. But it is Otherwiſe with you, I find, that are afraid to Dye, though to deliver your ſelves from Calamities Worſe then Death it ſelf: and in a Caſe too, that neither needs Councel, nor will bear Delay. We have it from Antiquity; the Holy Scriptures; the Laws, and Cuſtoms of our Country; the Doctrine, and Practice of our Forefathers: and it is All by Conſent, that it is not Life, but Death that makes a Man Happy. For what is it but Death that ſets the Soul at Liberty, and Tranſmits it into thoſe Pure and Bleſſed Regions where it ſhall never know Corruption. But ſo long as it Communicates with the Mortal Body, it partakes alſo with the Evils of That Body; and it is in a manner Dead, for what Affinity is there betwixt Divine and Mortal? Soul and Body in Conjunction, 'tis true, may do much; for the Body is but the Soul's Inſtrument, and their ſecret Offices and Operations are Unaccountable. But when the Soul comes once to be diſcharged of its Clog and Weight that keeps it down, and to recover its Proper Station, it Enjoys a Vigorous and a Perfect Liberty; not Viſible to Humane Eyes, but Inviſible, as God Himſelf is; and it is Inviſible alſo in our Bodies. It comes Into us Unſeen, and ſo it goes Out again; Incorruptible in it ſelf, but Cauſing Variety of Changes in the Body: For whatever the Soul influences, it puts Life and Vigour into it: and whenever it withdraws it ſelf, the Separation is Certain Death. But This does not hinder the Soul yet from being Immortal. As in Sleep, for Inſtance; How Quietly does the Soul Repoſe it ſelf in That Reſpite from the Diſtractions of the Body! which ſhews the Happineſs of the Soul is wrapt-up within it ſelf, and likewiſe that it holds ſome ſort of Communication with the Almighty, in Foretelling things to come. But how can any Man pretend to Fear Death that Loves Reſt! Or who but a Madman, for the ſake of a ſhort Life, will grudge himſelf a Life Eternal? Beſide that we are traind-up, by the Laws and Inſtitution of our Profeſſion, not only to the Contempt of Death Our ſelves; but alſo to Preach and Practice it for an Example to Others.

Of the Indian Philoſophers and Brachmans.

Or if there needed any Recourſe to Strangers for Argument, or Authority, upon This Subject, What ſhall we ſay to the Indian Philoſophers and Brachmans? a Wiſe, and a Virtuous ſort of People. They look upon Life only as a Neceſſary Function of Nature: an Office which they Diſcharge Uneaſily enough, and not without ſome Impatience to be quit of the Trouble. And they are not Weary of Life neither, upon the Account of Pain or Inconvenience; but for the Love of Immortality, and a Bleſſed Converſation that ſhall never have an End. Nay, they take Solemn Leave of their Friends too, as if it were but for a Journy, and tell them when they are a going: Neither does any body Offer to hinder them; but, on the Contrary, wiſh them Happy, and ſend Formal Meſſages by them to their Acquaintance, in a Full and Certain Confidence that they Underſtand one another. And ſo when they have receiv'd all their Orders and Inſtructions, they Commit their Bodies to the Fire, as a Preparatory Purification, and go-off with Acclamations, and to the Satisfaction of all the Spectators. For among them, Friends follow one another more Chearfully to Death, then they would do to a Long Journy; Joying Thoſe that are now Entring into a State of Immortality, and only Lamenting the reſt that ſtay behind. What a Shame will

it

it be for Us now to fall ſhort of the Indians, in a Matter of This Importance, and to bring a Scandal upon the Excellent Laws and Religion of our Forefathers by an Inglorious Abjection of Mind! Or put the Caſe now, that we had been Otherwiſe Inſtructed, and brought up in the Contrary Principles from our very Cradle; as if Life were the Sovereign Good of Mankind, and Death the moſt Diſmal of Calamities: The very Occaſion ſhould make us Reſolute methinks, in Our Caſe, ſince Neceſſity and the Will of God will have it ſo: And We are now to be Puniſh'd with the Loſs of Life, for our Former Abuſes of it, by the Ordering of a Divine Providence. Neither are we to Aſcribe it to our Own Arms, or to the Generoſity of the Romans, that we were not Every Man of us cut-off in This War. And it was not ſimply a Conqueſt neither; but the Mediation of a more Powerful Cauſe, that made it look like One however. What had the Romans to do in That Bloudy Maſſacre of the Jews at Cæſarea by the People of the Place, where Man, Woman and Child were cut-off upon their Seventh Day's Feſtival, without One Word of a Conſpiracy, or the Leaſt Reſiſtance: Whereas the Romans never look'd upon the Jews as their Enemies, but only when they Revolted. Now it will be ſaid perhaps, that there was an Old Grudge betwixt the Jews of Cæſarea and the Citizens; and that the Latter took This Opportunity for a Revenge. What ſhall we ſay then of the Scythopolitans that joyn'd with the Greeks againſt us, and not with our Friends againſt the Romans? And what did they get at laſt for their Good Will, but the Utter Deſtruction of Themſelves and their Families? This was the Thank, in fine, that we had for our Aſſiſtance; They brought Us into the ſame Extremity, out of which We Reſcu'd Them.

Several Inſtances of the Sufferings of the Jews.

It would be too Tedious to run over Particular Inſtances: For you know very well that there is not ſo much as One City in Syria that has Treated us Better, and that is not Incomparably Worſe to Us then the Romans. What do you think of Damaſcus now, that without any Colour, or Pretence of a Diſguſt, Butcher'd Ten Thouſand Jews, with their Wives and Children, in That ſingle City? And then they reckon upon at Leaſt Sixty Thouſand kill'd in Egypt. Now That's no Wonder, you'll ſay, in a Strange Land, where they had no Seconds to ſtand by them. But to come now to our Own Caſe at Home, that had the Courage to aſſert our Liberties againſt the Romans in our Own Country, and wanted neither Men nor Arms; Fearleſs Spirits; Impregnable Cities; Strong Holds, or any Other manner of Proviſions that might Encourage or Strengthen a Revolt, and Entitle us to a Reaſonable Hope of a Victorious Iſſue. But how long did This laſt, and to what End did This Pompous Preparation ſerve us; ſave only to our Greater Confuſion! For All is Loſt you ſee, and only to the Honour of the Enemy; without any Advantage to our ſelves, For, and By Whom Theſe Stores were provided.

The Queſtion of Life and Death Debated in favour of the Latter as the more deſirable of the Two.

How Happy are They now that fell with their Swords in their Hands, Contending for their Liberty, and in the ſame Act Preſerving it! Compar'd with the ſurviving Remainder of us that are Reſerv'd in Chains: Some for Torture; ſome for the Fire; Others for Spectacles; ſome for Combat, and Others to be torn to pieces with Whips: ſome half Eaten by Beaſts, and ſet aſide for a Second Meal! Who would not ſuffer a Thouſand Deaths rather then Lead ſuch a Life? But the moſt Deplorable of all the reſt are Thoſe that are yet Living; and calling upon Death, and yet have not the Heart to give it Themſelves.

Pray ſummon-up your Thoughts, and Conſider what is become of your Glorious Metropolis; your Mighty Walls and Fortifications; your Impregnable Towers and Caſtles; your Vaſt Treaſuries and Magazines (though too Little for your Stores); your Prodigious Multitudes of Men: And what's become of your Holy Place too, known by the Name of God's Houſe? Is it not All torn up by the Roots, and nothing to be ſeen of it, but the Ruines that ſerve only for a Camp to the Conquerour: a Few Unfortunate Old Men Mourning over the Aſhes of the Temple, and a Proviſion of Unhappy Women ſet apart for the Uſe and Service of the Soldiers?

Can any thing that hath but the Soul of a Man ever ſubmit to look Another Sun in the Face again after This? Nay, though he might Live without either Fear or Danger. Can any Man, I ſay, be ſo Unnatural to his Country; ſo Mean and Narow-Hearted, as not to be griev'd that ever he liv'd to ſee This Day? And it would have been Well, if we had been all in our Graves before ever we beheld Theſe Sacrilegious Ruines, and This Glorious Pile of Jeruſalem laid in Rubbiſh. But ſo long as we had Hopes and Courage, we flatter'd our ſelves with the Poſſibility of a Redemption. The Conceipt however of That Phancy being now over, and nothing left us to Truſt to, but the Conſideration of an Inſuperable Neceſſity: We have nothing more to do then to take Pity of our ſelves, our Wives, and our Children; and to make all the Haſte we can to do it, while we have the Means in our Own Hands. We are All Born to Dye; the Brave and the Coward alike, and all ſubjected to the ſame Fate. Now for Matter of Indignity and Slavery, the ſeeing of our Wives Diſhonour'd, and our Children led in Triumph; Theſe are not Evils ariſing from the Neceſſity of our Nature, but the Reſults of Cowardiſe, when a Man might have Dy'd and would not. But for Us that had the Hearts to abandon the Romans, and fly in the Face of our Maſters; and afterwards to Refuſe Quarter, and Pardon, when it was Offer'd us, and not ſo much as to accept of an Indemnity, though They Themſelves begg'd it of Us: Can any body think, I ſay, that if ever They take us Alive, This will be Forgotten.

Face

It makes a body's Heart ake to think of the Miſerable Condition both of Young and Old, betwixt the Strength of Body, on the One Hand, to lie languiſhing under a Lingring Torment; and the Weakneſs of Age, on the Other, that is not able to ſupport it. The Huſband muſt expect to ſee his Wife Diſhonour'd before his Face; and the Father, to hear his Children begging in Chains for Relief. But while we are Free, and Maſters of our Swords, let us make a Glorious Uſe of them, and Preſerve our Liberties. Let us Dye Free-men, with the Comfort and Company of our Wives and Children about us. It is but what They Themſelves deſire; What our Laws require at our Hands, and what Providence it ſelf hath made Neceſſary for us. Only the Romans are againſt it, for Fear we ſhould do Their Work for them. Let us Diſpatch then, for it will be to our Immortal Honour to take the Prize they long for out of their Hands, in leaving them only the poor Satisfaction of Dead Bodies for their Triumph.

The Whole Body is of the ſame Opinion with Eleazar, and Joins in a Reſolution not to Outlive their Laws and Liberties.

Eleazar would have gone-on, if the Company had not broken-in upon him One and all, in This very Inſtant; violently preſſing him to go thorough with his Work, and every Man Contending with a Phantaſtical Æmulation who ſhould be Foremoſt, as a Mark of the Braveſt and the Wiſeſt Man. Such was the Paſſion Theſe People had for the Deſtruction of Themſelves and their Families. And, which was yet more Wonderful, they did not One Man of them Shrink when they came to the Execution; but kept up their Dear and Natural Affection to the laſt, upon an Opinion that they could not do their Friends a Better Office. They took their Laſt Leave of their Wives and Children in their Arms, with a Kiſs, and a Stab; weeping over them at the ſame time, and no more Concern'd then if the Work had been done by Other People's Hands. The Neceſſity of the Action, (as They underſtood it) was their Comfort, and their Excuſe; for Conſidering what they ſhould have ſuffer'd otherwiſe by the Romans, they thought they could not do leſs toward Their Deliverance. In ſhort, there was not One Man's Heart fail'd him; but they kill'd their Beloved Friends and Relations without Diſtinction. This was a Miſerable Neceſſity; but they were driven upon it by a Miſerable Choice: for the Deſtroying of their Wives and Children, (as it appear'd to Them) was the Leaſt Evil they had before them.

The Execution and the Method of it.

When they had gone thus far, they found the Grief for what they had done already Intolerable; and being Conſcious to Themſelves, that they could not ſurvive Thoſe they had kill'd, (though never ſo little) without a Manifeſt Injury to the Dead, they immediately pil'd up all their Goods together on a Heap and burnt them; and Then chuſing Ten Men, by Lot, out of their Number, to do Execution upon all the reſt, they ranged themſelves as near as they could to the Dead Bodies of their Friends; gave them a Parting Embrace, and chearfully preſented their Throats to Thoſe that were to do the Inhumane Office. So ſoon as the Ten had with a Mighty Reſolution Diſcharged their Part, they caſt Lots among Themſelves which of the Remaining Ten ſhould Diſpatch the Other Nine, with a Condition that the Surviving Tenth Man ſhould kill himſelf upon the Bodies of the reſt: ſuch a Confidence had Theſe People one in another. The Nine dy'd with the ſame Conſtancy as the reſt. The Laſt Man overlooking the Bodies, and finding that they were All Stark Dead, ſet Fire to the Palace, and ſo Caſt himſelf upon his Sword among his Friends.

The Tragedy being now over; and upon a Preſumption, that there was not ſo much as One Jew fall'n into the Hands of the Romans, it appear'd afterwards that there was One Ancient Woman; and Another, a Kinſwoman of Eleazar's (a Perſon of Admirable Qualities) with Five ſmall Children, that lay cloſe all this while in an Aquæduct, and ſcap'd the Maſſacre. The Number of the Slain was Nine Hundred and Sixty, reckoning Women and Children into the Account. This Action fell-out upon the Fifteenth of the Month Xanthicus.

The Romans advance next Morning to the Aſſault, and find only a Pile of Dead Bod es to Receive them.

The Romans by break of Day next Morning, with their Ladders, and Bridges, made Ready for an Aſſault; but no Enemy appearing, nor any Noiſe to be heard, but the Crackling of Flames, the Romans could not tell what to make of Theſe Circumſtances, and of ſo Dead a Silence: ſo that they preſently gave a Yell, like a Shout upon the Playing of a Battery, to try if they could be Anſwer'd. The Clamour Alarum'd the Women in their Hiding-Holes; ſo that Out they came upon it, and told the Romans the Truth of the Whole Story; which was ſo Incredible however, that they could not believe it: but betaking themſelves to the Quenching of the Fire, and ſo following their Way up to the Palace, they found ſuch a Carnage of Dead Bodies, that without Inſulting and Rejoycing as Enemies, they they brake-out into Admiration at the Generous Greatneſs of the Jews Minds; the Steadineſs of their Councels, and the Obſtinate Agreement of ſuch a Number of Men in the Contempt of Death.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Turbulent and Seditious Humour of the Sicarii. The Jews Impute all their Misfortunes to that ſort of People. They will rather ſuffer Death then Own Cæſar for their Maſter.

AFter the Taking of Maſſada, Silva the Roman General ſettled a Garriſon there, and ſo March'd away with his Army to Cæſarea, leaving the Country in Perfect Peace and Quiet behind him. Now the Jews of Judæa were ſo abſolutely broken and ſubdu'd by the Burden and Continuance of the War, that there was not an Enemy to be heard of in all That Quarter; but there were Thoſe alſo that felt of it as far as Alexandria in Ægypt, where ſeveral of them were put to death. But a Word or Two upon This Occaſion will not be amiſs.

The Turbulent and Seditious Humour of the Sicarii.

There were divers of the Faction of the Sicarii that fled to Alexandria for Sanctuary: and it was not enough for Theſe People to live Eaſy and Quiet there, but They muſt be Tampering the Citizens into a Hankering after Innovations, and Starting Invidious Queſtions about Liberty and Paſſive Obedience. They look'd upon the Romans, they ſaid, to be no Better then Themſelves, and no Other Lord would They Own then the Lord of Heaven and Earth. And ſtill as they met with any Contradiction, though from the Beſt of their Own Profeſſion, it was as much as their Lives were Worth. Some they Murder'd; Others they Debauch'd from their Allegeance, or at leaſt Endeavour'd to do it: and, in fine, Theſe Practices of theirs became ſo Bold and Dangerous, that the Leading Men amongſt them did not think it ſafe to call them to any Publique Account. But the Courſe They took was to Summon a General Meeting of the Jews, and There to Arraign the Folly and Temerity of the Sicarii, and to Expoſe Them to the People as the Root and Cauſe of All our Misfortunes. Now what would be the End on't, ſaid they, if we ſhould Force them to fly for their Security? They'd be never the Better for it, and we the Worſe. For ſo ſoon as ever the Romans ſhall be well Enform'd of the Deſign; Their way will be to fall upon All promiſcuouſly, and ſo Deſtroy the Innocent with the Guilty. Wherefore they Caution'd the Jews not to Involve themſelves with the Sicarii, but rather to provide for their Own ſafety by delivering-up Thoſe Cut-Throats to the Romans.

Violent and Impatient of Contradiction.

The Jews Arraign them in a Publique Aſſembly, as the Authors of all their Misfortunes.

Not a Man of them would Own Cæſar for his Maſter, to ſave his Life.

This gave them ſuch a Proſpect of the Hazzard they were in, that they fell Violently upon the Sicarii, and took Six Hundred of them immediately. The reſt fled to Ægypt, Thebes, and thereabouts; where they were Retaken ſoon after, and brought back again; Behaving themſelves to Admiration, for the Inſuperable Hardineſs of their Reſolution. What a Variety of Exquiſite Torments did they Endure, rather then Acknowledge Cæſar for their Maſter; and not one Soul that would ſo much as Deliberate upon the doing of it. But they ſtood All as Firm, as if their Souls had not been Concern'd in what their Bodies Endur'd. And the Tranſcendent Miracle of All, is yet behind: which is, that the Boys, and the Children ſtood the ſame Streſs with the reſt; and when they had ſuffer'd all that Malice or Invention could Inflict upon them, not ſo much as One Soul of them would Own Cæſar to ſave his Life, ſo much was their Contempt of Torments above the Senſe of them.

CHAP. XXX.

Onias moves Ptolemey to give the Jews Leave to Build a Temple, and to Enjoy the Exerciſe of their Worſhip. Ptolemey gives Leave accordingly, and aſſigns them a ſpot of Ground for it. This Temple was Erected and afterwards ſhut up.

LUpus being at That time Governour of Alexandria, gave Cæſar Early Advice of This Commotion; who was ſo well acquainted with the Turbulent Humour of the Jews, that he thought he could not be too Cautious of their Meetings and Cabals, for fear of making Factions and Parties: and therefore Order'd Lupus to Demoliſh the Jews Temple in the City Onion in Ægypt; of which Temple I ſhall ſay ſomething, both as to the Name, and the Founder.

Onias the Son of Simon, One of the High Prieſts, being driven out of Jeruſalem in the time of the War betwixt Antiochus the King of Syria, and the Jews, withdrew to Alexandria; where he was very kindly receiv'd by Ptolemey the King of Ægypt; partly, as an Enemy to Antiochus, and partly upon a Condition agreed upon betwixt them; which was This. Onias undertook to bring the Jews over into Ptolemey's Intereſt, if he would but grant him One Requeſt. The King promis'd him that he would, if it lay in his Power; and ſo the Other begg'd his Leave only for the Jews to Erect a Temple ſomewhere or other in Ægypt, where they might Meet and Worſhip God according to the Laws and Religion of their Country. By This Means, ſays he, Antiochus will become ſtill more and more Odious to the Jews, and the Jews better affected to your ſervice; beſide the Vaſt Multitudes that will put themſelves under your Protection for the Free Exerciſe of their Worſhip.

Onias moves Ptolemey to give the Jews leave to Build a Temple, and Enjoy the Exerciſe of their Worſhip.

Ptolemey was well enough pleas'd with the Propoſal, and ſo aſſign'd the Jews a Spot of Ground for their Purpoſe, a matter of Nineſcore Furlongs from Memphis, in the Tract of Heliopolis: Onias built a Caſtle there; and after That, a Temple, though not Comparable 'tis true, to That at Jeruſalem; but it had juſt ſuch Another Tower, made of Vaſt Stones, and Sixty Cubits in Height. There was an Altar alſo, after the Model of Jeruſalem, and ſet out with Donatives and Preſents, much like the Other; ſaving only that there was no Candleſtick, but a Golden Lamp as Bright as the Sun, inſtead of it: which Hung upon a Gold Chain before the Altar. This Temple was Encompaſs'd with a Brick-Wall; the Gates of Stone; and it was likewiſe Endow'd with a Conſiderable Revenue, both in Land and Moneys, that there might be nothing wanting to the Solemnity and Celebration of the Service. Now Onias did not do all This, as we ſay, for Gods-ſake, and out of the Pure Simplicity of his Heart; but out of a Spleen he bare to the Jeruſalem-Jews that forc'd him away: And he propounded to himſelf by the Erecting of This Temple, to draw the Jews back to him again that had Forſaken him; eſpecially Reflecting upon an Old Prophecy of Nine Hundred and Seventy Years ſtanding, which ſeems to look That Way: beſide Another Prediction of the Prophet Iſaiah, of a Temple in time to come to be Erected in Ægypt by a Jew.

Ptolemey Grants the Requeſt, and Aſſigns a Spot of Ground for it.

This Temple was built accordingly; and Lupus, in Purſuance of the Emperour's Orders, went directly thither; took away with him ſeveral Preſents and Oblations that he found there, and ſo ſhut it up. But Paulinus, who ſucceeded to the Government after the Death of Lupus, not only Stript the Temple of what he found there, without leaving ſo much as One Piece behind him; but threaten'd the Prieſts bloudily too in Caſe of any Concealment: nor would he receive any Man whatſoever into the Temple upon the Account of Religion; but ſhut the Doors againſt them, without leaving ſo much as the Leaſt Appearance of Divine Worſhip there. It was now Three Hundred Thirty and Three Years from the Building of This Temple to the Shutting of it up.

The Temple was Erected, and after That Rifled and Shut-up.

CHAP. XXXI.

Jonathan an Enthuſiaſt-Weaver, draws a Party after him. They are Taken and brought Priſoners to Catullus, only Jonathan Shifts out of the Way: but being afterwards Taken he comes to a Better Uderſtanding with Catullus. His Maſterpiece was Subornation and Corruption. 3000 Jews put to Death at a time. Jonathan ſets-up for a Falſe Witneſs. Joſeph the Author of This Hiſtory is made a Priſoner. Veſpaſian pronounces Joſeph Innocent, and Sentences Jonathan to be Whipt and Burnt alive. Catullus Ends his Days in Torments of Body and Mind not to be Expreſſed.

THE Audacious Inſolence of the Sicarii ſpread like a Contagion Every where about Cyrene: as for Example. There was One Jonathan, a Weaver, that made his Eſcape thither. He was a kind of an Enthuſiaſt, and a Wicked Man, that drew a World of Simple People after him into Woods and Deſarts, under a Pretext of ſhewing them Prodigies, and Viſions: and the Impoſture paſs'd for Current with the Common Sort. But the Story coming to the Ears of ſome Eminent Jews at Cyrene, they preſently traced it out, and gave Timely Notice of it to Catullus the Governour of the Pentapolitan Lybia, how the Bus'neſs ſtood, and which way they March'd. The Governour Way-laid them with Horſe and Foot, and Eaſily Maſter'd them, for they were but ſo many Unarm'd Men: A Great Part of them were kill'd, and the reſt Taken Alive and carry'd Priſoners to Catullus.

The Inſolence of the Sicarii.

Jonathan a Weaver, and an Enthuſiaſt, puts himſelf in the Head of a Faction.

The Whole Party is Routed, and ſent Priſoners to Catullus: Only Jonathan makes his Eſcape, but being taken at laſt, and carried to Catullus, he found a way to divert the Storm from Himſelf.

Jonathan the Ring-leader of This Wretched Multitude made his Eſcape; but after a long, and a Strict Search, he was at laſt found out and Taken, and ſo Carry'd to Catullus; where he found out a Way to divert the Storm from Himſelf, and to furniſh the Governour with an Acceptable Occaſion of turning it Another Way: which was, by bringing the Wealthieſt Jews of the Place into the Plot, as the Heads and Promoters of the Conſpiracy. Theſe Accuſations, how Falſe ſoever, were Welcome to Catullus; who fell preſently to Deſcant, and Amplify upon Things with ſuch Aggravations, that a War againſt the Jews was as good as declar'd already. And to make the Villany yet more Execrable, he had not only the Faculty of believing againſt Truth and Reaſon; but Inſtructed the very Sicarii Themſelves in the Art of Calumny: inſomuch that he expreſsly directed the Falſe Witneſſes to Accuſe one Alexander, a Jew, by Name; to whom he had a long time declar'd himſelf a Profeſs't Enemy; and his Wife Berenice was alſo Enſnar'd upon the ſame Evidence. Theſe were the Firſt that ſuffer'd; and after Them, a Train of Three Thouſand more put to death at once; Whoſe only Crime was, that they were Men of Wealth and Credit. And This, he thought, he might ſafely do, though he took their Mony to Himſelf, ſo long as their Eſtates were Confiſcate to the Empire.

His Maſter-Piece was Subornation and Corruption.

3000 Jews put to Death at a time, purely upon the Score of Wealth, and Credit.

And then for fear of being Detected by Jews of Credit Elſewhere, he carry'd the Impoſture further yet, and dealt with Jonathan, and ſome Other Priſoners, to make a Cull of the moſt Eminent Men they had, for Honour and Integrity in Rome and Alexandria, and to Exhibit New Matter againſt them. Joſeph Himſelf, the Author of This Hiſtory, was One of the Number. Now Catullus coming to Rome, and bringing Jonathan and the reſt of the Priſoners in Chains along with him, he made no doubt but the Scrutiny was all over; and the Fact given for granted, as he had Repreſented, and Concerted it. But the Event of This Contrivance did not Anſwer his Expectation; for Veſpaſian, being a little ſuſpicious upon the main, reſolved to ſift it out; and finding upon Examination the Iniquity of the Proceeding, he pronounced, at the Inſtance of Titus, Joſeph and his Companions Innocent; and thereupon they were Diſcharg'd: But at the ſame time, he Sentenc'd Jonathan to be Whipt, and Burnt Alive; which was accordingly Executed.

Veſpaſian ſuſpects Foul Dealing, and upon Examination pronounces Joſeph Innocent: And Sentences Jonathan to be Whipt, and Burnt alive.

As for Catullus; ſuch was the Lenity of the Two Princes, that they proceeded no further againſt him at preſent: but, in a ſhort time after This, he was ſeiz'd with an Incurable Complication of Diſeaſes; Horrid Gripes, and Pains all over his Body; and the Anguiſh of his Mind yet more Inſupportable; Torments of Conſcience; Ghaſtly Apparitions, and Outcries, upon his being haunted with the Ghoſts of Thoſe he had Murder'd; Starting out of his Bed, and Roaring-out, as if he were upon the Torture, or in the Flames. His Affliction, in fine, encreas'd upon him, till his Guts Putrify'd, Rotted and came out; This was his End; being Effectually no Other then a Divine Vengeance upon a Wicked Man.

Catullus Ended his Days in Tortures of Body and Mind, not to be Expreſs'd.

We

We are Now come to the End of our Hiſtory, wherein We have Proceeded with All Faith and Candour, according to Our Promiſe; for the Satisfaction of Thoſe that deſire to be Truly Enform'd in the Particulars of the War betwixt the Romans and the Jews. How I have Acquitted my ſelf in the Manner of Writing This Relation, let the Reader Judge. But as to the Sincerity of it upon the Whole, I do here declare to the World, that I have kept my ſelf Strictly to the Truth of Things from One End of the Book to the Other.

Flavius Joſephus:

Written by his own Hand.

SEVERAL Nations value the Honour and Dignity of Birth and Extraction, upon ſeveral Accounts; but with Us, nothing more Illuſtrates a Family than a Lineal Succeſſion of Holy Men in the Sacerdotal Dignity: and, in that reſpect, I may aſſume to my ſelf the Advantage of ſomewhat better Blood in my Veins than Ordinary, as I derive my Original through a long Train of Religious Anceſtors; and not only in a Regular Deſcent from Men in Sacred Orders, but from Prieſts of the firſt Rank of the Four and Twenty, which is yet a higher Advancement by ſo many Degrees. I might write my ſelf alſo by my Mother's ſide, of the Stock of Kings; for the Kingdom, and the Prieſthood went a long time together in the (a) Aſmonæan Family, from which ſhe was deſcended. But now to take the Succeſſion in order; Simon, otherwiſe called Pſellus, was my Great Great Grandfather, who lived when Hyrcanus the Son of Simon the High-Prieſt, and the firſt of the Name, had the Pontificate. This Pſellus had Nine Sons; Matthias for One, ſurnamed Aphlias, who in the firſt Year of King Hyrcanus marry'd the Daughter of Jonathan the High-Prieſt, and had by her, Matthias, ſurnamed Curtus, who, in the Ninth Year of the Reign of Alexander, had a Son Joſeph, from whom came Matthias, in the Tenth of Archelaus; and from him, in the firſt Year of Caius Cæſar, came I my ſelf; who have likewiſe Three Sons; Hyrcanus, the Eldeſt, was born in the Fourth Year of Veſpaſian; Juſtus, the Second, in the Seventh; and Agrippa, the Youngeſt, in the Ninth. This is a ſhort, and a true Account of my Extraction as it ſtands upon Record, beyond all Contradiction, and in Defiance of Envy and Detraction.

Joſeph's Extraction.

Joſeph had 3 Sons: Hyrcanus, Juſtus, and Agrippa.

My Father Matthias was greatly eſteemed in Jeruſalem, from the Higheſt to the Loweſt, not only for the Honour of his Deſcent, but much more ſtill for his Probity and Juſtice. I had a Brother of my Father's Name, and we two were train'd up at School together from Children. Now having a tolerable Senſe of Things, and an excellent Memory, I made ſo early a Progreſs in my Studies, that at Fourteen Years of Age, the High-Prieſt and Elders would do me the Honour now and then to adviſe with me, even upon ſome Intricate Caſes of Law. At my entrance into Sixteen, I began to Inform my ſelf in the Doctrines, and Opinions of the Three Sects I have ſpoken of elſewhere; the Phariſees, the Sadduces, and the Eſſenes; propounding to my ſelf to take a Taſt of them all, and ſtick to what I lik'd beſt. So I paſs'd thorough all three, one after another, with much Labour and Mortification. And I did not reſt there neither; but hearing of one Banus that led the Life of a Hermite, in Caves, and Solitudes, I made a Tryal of his way alſo. He wore no Covering but of the Bark of Trees: His Food was only what the Earth and the Woods brought forth of their own accord; and bathing himſelf Night and Day in Cold Water, to allay the Heat of unruly Appetites. When I had kept him Company in theſe Auſterities for a matter of three Years, and ſatisfy'd my Curioſity in the Experiment, I returned to the City, and being now Nineteen Years of Age, apply'd my ſelf to the Buſineſs of a Civil Life, in the way of the Phariſees, which is much after the Humour of the Stoicks among the Greeks.

He applies himſelf to the Study of the 3 Sects,

Joſephus inclines to the way of the Phariſees.

There fell out a very Particular Occaſion, in the Six and Twentieth Year of my Age, that carry'd me to Rome; and This was it. Felix, being at That time Governour of Judæa, had ſent ſeveral Prieſts, many of them Worthy Men, and my Particular Friends, Priſoners thither, upon a very Frivolous Pretence, to clear themſelves of what ſhould be Objected againſt them before Cæſar They behaved themſelves with ſo Generous a Conſtancy, chooſing rather to ſuffer any thing, than to depart from their Duty, that upon This Conſideration I Reſolv'd to run any Riſque in the World to Relieve them: So I Embarqu'd for Rome, and falling into a Deſperate Storm with a matter of 600 Perſons in company, we were Caſt away, and the Veſſel loſt in the Adriatick Gulph; only Eighty Perſons of the Whole Number by a Wonderful Providence preſerv'd, being taken up Early the next Morning by a Ship of Cyrene, when we had kept our ſelves above Water a Whole Night by Swimming. After This Deliverance, I came Acquainted at Dicæarchia, (or Puteoli, as the Italians chuſe rather to call it) with one Aliturus, a Mimical Comœdian, and a Jew born; for whom Nero had a Great Kindneſs. This Aliturus brought me to the Knowledge of the Empreſs (a) Poppæa, who immediately upon my Requeſt, got the Prieſts ſet at Liberty: And ſo I went back again into my Country, not without Conſiderable Preſents over and above. Upon my Return I found Miſchief a-brewing, and the People dangerouſly Diſpos'd to a Revolt; whereupon I did what I could to bring the Mutineers to better Reaſon. I bad them conſider Well what they were about, and the Circumſtances of the Enemy they had to do withall; A Martial, a Politick, a Well-Diſciplin'd, and a Fortunate People, and ſo much an Over-match for them to All Purpoſes, that they muſt be worſe than Mad-men to venture Life, Limb, Liberty, and Eſtate; Wives, Children, and all that could be Dear to them, upon ſo Unequal Terms. At This rate I plyed them with Arguments, Counſels, and Importunities, to Divert them from an Outrage that was likely to be attended with ſo many Mortal Conſequences. But This was only ſo many Words caſt away; which, in truth, did more Hurt than Good; and inſtead of Compoſing them one Way, hazarded the Enraging of them Another. For my Preſſing the ſame thing over and over again, ſo often to them, look'd all this while like a Siding with the Enemy, which upon the Leaſt Freak of Jealouſie, (that I had reaſon enough to apprehend) would in all Probability have coſt me my Life. The Faction being already Poſſeſs'd of the Fort Antonia, I had nothing to do but to take Sanctuary in the Inner-Temple. From Thence, upon the Fall of Manahem, and the Ring-Leaders of the Conſpiracy, I betook my ſelf to the High-Prieſt, and the Eminent Men of the Phariſees: whom I found directly at their Wits End What Courſe to Steer; for the People were all in Arms, and What to do with Themſelves, they knew not. When we ſaw that Thwarting and Diſſwading would do no Good, we went a Middle-way to work, betwixt Cloſing with them and Diſſenting; pretending, upon the Main, to be of Their Opinion; but yet under ſuch Cautions, that we Adviſ'd them not to be too Haſty; but let the Enemy draw off a little; for Geſſius had a Conſiderable Force, and would be with us time enough to put an end to That Tumult. Geſſius came back indeed, to his Coſt, for he was totally Defeated; moſt of his Troops Cut to Pieces: and This Blow, in fine, prov'd the Utter Ruine of our Nation. For the Faction had the Vanity, after This Defeat, to Flatter themſelves, that they ſhould with as much Eaſe run down the Whole Power of Rome. But there happen'd at This time a Terrible Outrage, which was as follows.

The Syrians and the Jews living promiſcuouſly together in ſeveral Great Towns bordering upon Judæa, the Syrian Inhabitants took their Opportunity, and Cut the Throats of all the Jews, Man, Woman, and Child, that Liv'd with them in Thoſe Neighbouring Cities; and all This, without any ſort of Provocation or Offence: For there was Nothing of a Conſpiracy, or ſo much as a Diſaffection to the Romans, Charg'd upon them. But above all the reſt, the Barbarity of the Scythopolitans was the moſt Inhumane and Impious. For they not only forced the Jews of the Place that were their Fellow-Citizens, to bear Arms againſt Thoſe of their Own Tribe that came before it, (a Thing Expreſly forbidden by our Laws) but when they had Worſted the Enemy by their Aſſiſtance, without any regard to Gratitude, Juſtice, or Common Faith, they put them all to the Sword, without Mercy, or Diſtinction, to the Number of ſeveral Thouſands. The Jews of Damaſcus were Treated much at the ſame rate too; but in our Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews we have Diſcours'd This Matter more at Large. Neither would it be worth the While to Mention it over again, if it were not to give the Reader to Underſtand, that we did not Undertake This War upon Choice, but that we were driven upon it by the Force of an Extreme Neceſſity

After This Overthrow of Geſſius, the Leading Men of the Jews, finding themſelves Weak and Unarmed, and in Danger of a Powerful, Turbulent Faction, they thought it High Time now to look about them, and provide for their Own Security. So that Conſidering how Galilee was divided, and Part of it For the Romans, Part Againſt them, they were pleaſed to make Choice of my ſelf for One, and Two Other Prieſts, Joazar and Judas, (very Good Honeſt Men) to ſend as Commiſſioners thither, to try if we could prevail with the Seditious People there to lay down their Arms; not ſo as to part with them quite; but only to Depoſite them for the Preſent in the Hands of their Governours, till they ſhould have Occaſion to Uſe them; but not to do any Act of Violence till they ſhould be Better Enform'd what the Romans intended to do.

With Theſe Inſtructions, I went my way into Gallilee, where I found the Galliläans, and the Sepphorites at Hard Words, and ready to come to Blows upon This Point. The Gallilæans preſs'd upon the Sepphorites to make an Inroad into their Country; and the ground of the Quarrel was, Their Standing up for the Romans, and their Adherence to Senius Gallus, then Governour of Syria. The Sepphorites, on the Other hand Oppoſed them, in Defence both of their Country, and of their League and Duty: But I found a way to ſet the Sepphorites Hearts at reſt, and to Quiet the Gallilæans, by getting them a Licence to Send as often as they pleas'd to Dora, a City of Phœnicia, to their Hoſtages there that they had given to Geſſius.

A Quarrel betwixt the Gallilæans and the Sepphorites.

As for the People of Tiberias, I found them all in Arms, and This was the Quarrel. There were Three Parties in this City: The One conſiſted of Men of Honour and Integrity; and Julius Capella was the Head of them; who was Joyn'd by Herod, the Son of Miarus, Herod the Son of Gamalus, and Compſus the Son of Compſus: But as for his Brother Criſpus, that Agrippa the Great had made Governour of the Town long ſince, he liv'd at This time upon his Own Eſtate beyond Jordan Theſe were all for the King, and the People of Rome: Piſtus being the Only Man of the Nobility that went the Other way, in a Complyance with a Popular Humour of his Son Juſtus. The Second Faction was a kind of a Rabble of Mean People: and the Head of the Third was Juſtus, the Son of Piſtus; who, though he would not give his Opinion Point Blank for a War, did moſt Undoubtedly Wiſh for one in his Heart, upon the Proſpect of Advancing his Own Fortune by the Confuſion. In Order to This End he prepar'd the People for his Purpoſe, by a Skewing Diſcourſe upon the Matter then in Queſtion, giving them to Underſtand, "That Their City was always reckoned to belong to Gallilee; and in the Days of Herod the Tetrarch, who was the "Founder of it, reputed the Capital of the Province; and by Him kept in Subjection. "This Right of Precedency was never ſo much as Queſtion'd from the time of Agrippa the Father till the Government of Felix; when Nero gave it away to the Younger Agrippa. The People of Sepphoris, in fine, never Claim'd any Privilege above "their Neighbours till the Subjecting of themſelves to the Roman Yoak, and the Re"moving of the Records and Treaſury, upon That Revolution. Juſtus went on at This rate, Tampering and Enflaming the People againſt the King, till he found them at laſt in Tune for Miſchief, and then he told them in Plain terms, That ſince the Sepphorites were ſo Obſtinately Devoted to the Intereſt of the Romans, that there was No Taking them off, they had no Other way in the World to Vindicate their Rights and Liberties, once for all, but immediately to take up Arms, and Joyn with the reſt of their Companions to Oppoſe the Sepphorites, wherein they needed not doubt to be Well Seconded, againſt ſo Hateful a ſort of People. With This Popular and Plauſible Way of Paradoxing Soberer Men than himſelf out of their Senſes, he did his Buſineſs. Beſide that he was ſo far Maſter of the Greek Tongue as to Write the Hiſtory of Thoſe times; Palliating and Diſguiſing the Truth of Things, as he found it moſt for his Purpoſe. But I ſhall now give a more Particular Account of the Malice and Wickedneſs of This Man; and how near He and his Brother went to the Total and Irrecoverable Deſtruction of their Country, in the Following Diſcourſe. When Juſtus had gain'd over ſome of the Citizens by Perſwaſion, and Others by Force, to take up Arms, he Marched out with them in a Body, and ſet Fire to the Habitations of the Hippenians and Gadarenes, about Tiberias, and Scythopolis.

To paſs over now from the State of Tiberias to That of Giſchala; John the Son of Levi, finding ſeveral of his Fellow-Citizens ſo violently impatient of the Roman Yoak, did all that in him lay to keep them within the compaſs of Good Faith and Duty: but his Endeavours were to no manner of purpoſe, for the People Bordering thereabouts; as the Gadarenes, the Gabaraganeans, and the Tyrians, Joyning their Forces together, Attack'd the Town, and Took it by Force; Burnt and Deſtroy'd all before them, and ſo went their way back again. John was ſo Exaſperated with This Outrage, that he drew his Troops together, March'd againſt him, Fought, and Defeated him; and after That, Rebuilt the Place, and for Better Security Encompaſs'd it with a Strong Wall.

Giſchala laid in Aſhes. John the Son of Levi gives the Rebels a Defeat.

But the People of Gamala ſtood Firm all this while to the Romans, as will be ſeen in what follows. Philip the Son of Jacimus, King Agrippa's Lieutenant, having made a Wonderful Eſcape out of Jeruſalem, while the Enemy was before the Palace, fell into Another Hazard of being Deſtroy'd by Manahem, and his Cut-Throat-Companions; but was yet Preſerv'd by ſome of his Babylonian Relations, which were then at Jeruſalem; and upon the 5th Day after his coming off, he put himſelf into a Disguise by a Cap of False Hair, and so Shifted away till he came to a certain Village of his Own, near the Castle of Gamala, where he sent for a Considerable Number of his Subjects to come to him. In This Place he was Seized with a Sudden Fever, which by a Wonderful Providence prov'd the Occasion of Saving his Life. For upon falling into This Distemper, he wrote to Agrippa and Berenice by a Certain Freeman of Trust and Credit; with Order to deliver his Letters to Varus, to whom the King and the Queen had at That time Committed the Care of the Palace, They Themselves being upon a Journey at that Time to Berytus, to meet Gessius. When Varus came to Understand, upon the Receit of the Said Letters, that Philip had made his Escape, he took it Exceedingly to Heart to find that he was at Liberty, for fear the King and the Queen should Discharge him of their Service upon the Other's Return: So that Varus Expos'd the Messenger to the People as an Impostor, and one that had brought him a Sham-Story: For Philip, he said, to his Knowledge, was at that time at Jerusalem with the Jews, making War against the Romans; and upon This Calumny he caus'd him to be put to Death. When Philip had waited a Good while, and no News either of the Freeman, or of the Letters, he Dispatch'd away a Second Messenger with Another Pacquet, to Enquire what was become of the Former; and the Same Pretence did His Business too as well as the Others. Now the Syrians of Cæsarea had put a Conceit into Varus's Head, that the Romans would certainly Revenge themselves upon Agrippa for this Rebellion of the Jews, and that upon his Death, the Crown would Naturally come to Him, as a Branch of the Royal Line from Sohemus the Tetrarch of Libanus. Varus was so puff'd up with This Perswasion, that he Intercepted the King's Letters; Way-laid All the Passes, that no Body should get at him with Intelligence, and did all that was to be done, in fine, to keep him a Stranger to the Whole Matter. He put Great Numbers of the Jews to Death, to make an Interest with the Syrians of Cæsarea; and so likewise for the Jews in Ecbatana, which they call Babylonians, He proposed the Engaging of the Trachonites of Batanea with him in a War against Them too. In Order to the Prosecution of This Design, he sent for Twelve of the Principal Jews in Cæsarea; and Dispatch'd them away in his Name with This Message to their Friends at Ecbatana; That Varus had been told of a Conspiracy a-foot among them against their King, which he was not willing to believe, but however required of them to lay down their Arms, as the most Demonstrative Proof they could give him of their Innocence, and that the Report was False; Adding to This, That they should send him Seventy of the most Eminent Men of their Party, that might be ready to Answer All Objections on the behalf of the rest. The Twelve Deputies went accordingly, and Acquitted themselves of their Commission; but upon a strict Enquiry at Ecbatana among the People of their Own Tribe, not finding the least Colour for any such Rumour, they took, according to their Instructions, Seventy of the Best Men of the Place along with them, and so went their way all in Company together toward Cæsarea: Varus in the mean time having Planted himself in the Passage with a Guard of the King's Troops about him; who fell upon them on the way, and cut off every Soul of them to One Single Man; after which, he Advanced upon his Design against the Jews at Ecbatana. But by a Strange Providence, the Person that escap'd the Massacre got thither before him, with the News of This Abominable Treachery; whereupon the Inhabitants immediately put themselves in Arms, and with their Wives and Children withdrew into the Castle of Gamala, leaving their Goods, and Cattle behind them, to a Mighty Value. So soon as ever Philip heard of This Adventure, he went thither to them; where he was welcom'd with the Universal Acclamations of the People, and with the Tender of their Lives and Fortunes at his Service, in a War against Varus, and his Cæsarean Abettors, if he would but do them the Honour to Command them: For it was now Bruited about, that the King was Slain. But Philip did all he could to Compose them, by putting them in mind of the Generous Obligations the King had laid upon them; the Formidable Power of the Romans; with the Desperate Hazards of a Rebellion: Insomuch, that they were brought in the Conclusion to Better Reason. When the King came to Understand what had pass'd, and that Varus had taken up a Resolution of putting to Death all the Jews in Cæsarea, with their Wives and Children, to the Number of a Great many Thousands, he Removed Varus from his Government, and made (a) Equus Modius his Successor; as we have said Elsewhere: Philip keeping Gamala, and the Country Bordering upon it Firm to the Romans.

Upon my coming to Gallilee, being given to Understand by Certain Intelligence, the Condition of this Affair, I wrote to the Council at Jerusalem, to receive the Honour of their Commands; and the Answer they sent me was an Order to stay in Gallilee, and to provide the Best I could for the Security and Defence of the Place, and to keep my Collegues still about me, if they thought fit. time gather'd up a Conſiderable Summ of Money that was in Arrear for the Prieſts Tenths, they were bethinking themſelves of going home again; but upon my requeſt to ſtay a little longer with me, till things might be put in ſome Sort of Order, they agreed without any Difficulty. So we went all together from Sepphoris to Bethmaus, a place within ſome Four Furlongs of Tiberias, from whence I ſent a Meſſenger to Summon the Senate of Tiberias, and ſome of the Principals of the People to come over to me. Upon their Arrival, and Juſtus among the reſt, I told them that I was Order'd by the Council of Jeruſalem, together with my Companions, to Confer with them about the Demoliſhing of the Palace which Herod the Tetrarch had Erected there, and Adorned with Several Curious Images and Figures of Living Creatures, being a thing abſolutely forbidden by Our Laws; Earneſtly deſiring that it might be done out of hand. Capella, and the People of his Faction, Oppos'd it a Long time; but at laſt, after a Hard Conteſt, we carried the Point: Now while This Controverſie was a-foot, Jeſus the (a) Son of Saphia, at the Head of a Scandalous Crew of Tarpaulins, and Other Beggarly Fellows, with the Help of a Band of Seditious Galilæans, ſet fire to the Palace Royal, in Expectation of a Conſiderable Booty; for Every thing they ſaw, was Rich and Gilded: And in Effect, they ſpoil'd and carry'd away a Great many Good things, in deſpite of all could be done to Hinder it. So ſoon as This Conference with Capella, and the Governours of Tiberias was over, we betook our Selves from Bethmaus into the Upper Gallilee; at which time the Faction of Jeſus put all the Greeks in Tiberias to the Sword, and all Others likewiſe that had been Enemies to them before the War. Upon the News of this Outrage, I went in a Great Paſſion to Tiberias, to try what I could Save or Preſerve, of the King's Goods upon This Pillage; as there were Several Rich Candleſticks of Corinthian Work; Precious Tables; a great deal of Silver in the Maſs: And in fine, reſolving all this while to Depoſite what Goods ſoever I ſeiz'd, for the King's Uſe: So that ſending for Ten of the Chief Senators, and Capella the Son of Antillus, I deliver'd all the Rich Veſſels and Other Things of Value into their Cuſtody, with a Charge Expreſs not to part with them to any Body but my Self. I went from thence with my Companions to Giſchala, to Inform my Self what John intended to do; whom I found manifeſtly Engag'd in the making of a Party, and ſetting up for himſelf. The Emperour had ſeveral Magazines of Corn up and down in the Upper Gallilee, and John would fain have had the Exporting, and the Vending of it, with an Intent, he ſaid, to Employ the Profit upon the Building of Walls and Fortifications. I found what he would be at, and told him plainly, that it was a Thing I could not give way to. For being Obliged by Virtue of my Commiſſion from Jeruſalem to take care of all things within That Juriſdiction, I could not Diſpoſe of Thoſe Stores any Other way than either to the Service of the Emperour, or the Good of the Province. When he found I was not to be Wrought upon, he apply'd himſelf to my Collegues, who, betwixt want of Foreſight and the Love of Money, were brought over by Bribes and Fair Words to Comply with his Demands; and being Two to One, they muſt needs carry it. John had no ſooner gained this Point, but he bethought himſelf of Another Invention. The Inhabitants of Cæſarea-Philippi were Complaining to him, he ſaid, for want of Pure Virgin-Oyl, and deſired Him to ſupply them; the Greek Oyl being forbidden them, and the King's Prohibition Barring them from going out of Town to Fetch it. Now This was not ſo much Religion in him, as Intereſt; for he knew that This Oyl bore Forty times the Price at Giſchala that it did at Cæſarea; ſo that he ſent away all the Oyl from One place to the other, under a Colour of my Licence. Now the Truth of it is, I did ſo far Licence the Tranſporting of it, that I durſt not pretend to Hinder it, for fear the People ſhould Stone me; and ſo far only I Yielded to it. This, in ſhort, was an Advice that John made a Great Advantage of.

From This Place I ſent my Collegues back again to Jeruſalem; and after That, made it my Whole Buſineſs to Arm, Fortify, and in ſhort, to Provide the Beſt I could for the Defence of my Province. The Free-Booters I found, were not to be Reduced by Force; and ſo I put the People upon Trying what might be done by Compoſition; whereupon we Enter'd into a Treaty with ſeveral Leading Men among them to take them into Pay; being all Convinced, that the Charge of the Penſion would not be Comparable to the Spoil they'd make by Rapine and Pillage. We came, in fine, to an Agreement; and I took their Oaths for Performance of Articles, and ſo Diſmiſs'd them. The Conditions were theſe; That they ſhould not Offer any Violence, either to Romans or Natives, nor ever ſet Foot into our Country, but when they were call'd; or elſe behind hand in their Pay. But above all Other things, it was my Care in the Firſt place, to keep Gallilee Quiet; and in Order to That End, I made Choice of Seventy of their Beſt Men to go along with me, whom I made made uſe of, both as Companions, Councellors, and Aſſiſtants: Nay, and I Govern'd my ſelf in a Great Meaſure too, by their Advice, ſaving an Inviolable Reſpect all the While to Integrity and Juſtice: ſo that under the Appearance of Friends, they ſerv'd me likewiſe in the Quality of Hoſtages.

I was now in the Thirtieth Year of my Life; an Age wherein all the Virtue and Precaution in Nature is not able to ſecure a Man from the Laſh of Envy and Detraction; Eſpecially in a Poſt of Honour and Power. But I can ſay This for my ſelf however, That I was never Charg'd with any Miſdemeanour, either in Matter of Women, or Corruption. I Wanted Nothing, and I Coveted Nothing: Nay, I was ſo far from taking any thing that did not belong to me, that I refuſed my very Tenths, though properly Due to me as a Prieſt, even when they were Offer'd me. As for the Spoils upon the Defeat I gave the Syrians, it is very true that I ſent part of That Booty to my Kindred at Jeruſalem; and ſo after Two Overthrows given to the Sepphorites; Four to the People of Tiberias; the Gadarenes once at my Mercy, and John himſelf, after ſeveral Treacherous Practices, made my Priſoner, I paſs'd it all over without taking any Revenge, either of the One or the Other; and God that ſaw the Innocence of my Heart in This Whole Matter, was ſo Gracious as to Deliver me from the Snares of my Perfidious Enemies; and not upon That Occaſion only, but divers times afterwards, as will be ſeen in its proper place.

The Modeſty and Juſtice of Joſeph's Adminiſtration.

The Gallilæans have a Great Veneration for Joſeph.

The People of Gallilee had all of them ſuch a Reſpect and Tenderneſs for Me, that though they ſaw their Towns Deſtroy'd, and their Wives and Children Hurry'd away into Captivity before their Faces, they had much a Greater Concern yet for My Hazards and Sufferings than their Own. John was ready to Burſt all this while with Envy at the thought of my being ſo Popular; and under the Pretext of a Preſent Indiſpoſition, he Wrote to Me for leave to go to the Hot Baths of Tiberias for his Health; which I not only granted him at firſt Word, without ſo much as Dreaming of any Trick in the Bottom of it, but gave him Recommendatory Letters alſo to provide for the Entertainment of Himſelf and his Train, with Meat, Drink, Lodging, and all other Conveniencies, and to take care that they wanted Nothing. I was at This time in a Village of Gallilee call'd Cana. John was no ſooner come to Tiberias, but he fell preſently to work upon Debauching the Inhabitants into a Sedition, and inveigling them over into his Party. There were a great many among them Forward and Factious enough, to Hearken to any thing that might lead to a Change; and Glad at Heart too, of ſuch an Occaſion: As among Others, Juſtus, and his Father Piſtus, who immediately Cloſed with the Propoſition, and Joyn'd Intereſts with John againſt me. But by God's Providence the Plot was ſeaſonably Diſappointed; for Silas, my Deputy Governour of Tiberias, ſent me the Whole Story of it from Point to Point, how the Caſe ſtood at That time, and what they intended: Adviſing me by all means to haſten thither all I could, and Prevent the Miſchief before it was too Late; for the Government would be quickly in Other Hands elſe. Upon reading This Intelligence, I Poſted away for Tiberias with 200 Men; ſent a Meſſenger before, to let my Friends know I was a-coming, and ſo travelled the Whole Night. The People, Early in the Morning, came out of the Town to meet me upon the Way, and John Himſelf among the reſt; but ſo out of Countenance and Confounded, that he betrayed his Guilt in his Face. Being now Conſcious to Himſelf that his Neck was at Stake if he was Diſcover'd, he made a Haſty Reverence, and That Inſtant withdrew to his Lodging. In the mean time away went I to the Publick place of Exercíſes, where I diſcharg'd my Own Train all but One Man, and 10 Soldiers that I kept about me. After This, I mounted a High Standing that I took up there, from whence I made a Diſcourſe to the Tiberians, upon the Subject of Good Faith and Allegiance; the Honour of a Generous Conſtancy; and the Dangerous Conſequences, as well as the Actual Baſeneſs, of Betraying a Truſt; for One Treachery, I told them, would moſt certainly be Avenged upon the Head of the Traytor by Another, and that after One Act of Perfidy, their Credit would be loſt for ever. The words were hardly out of my Mouth, but I heard ſome body call Fiercely and Earneſtly to me immediately to [come Down, and provide for my Own Security, for my Enemies were juſt upon me; and that This was No Time for Speeches.] Now the Truth of it was, that having me at an Advantage in a place where I was little better then Alone, John drew a Select Number of Men out of the Thouſand that he Commanded, with Orders to fall upon me there by Surprize: and they were already Advanc'd within a very little of Executing their Deſign; which they had certainly done, if I had not leapt down That very Moment by the help of one of my Own Guards whoſe Name was Jacob, and one Herod of Tiberias, who led me off to the Lake; where, by Great Providence, I found a Veſſel ready that carried me off to Taricheæ, beyond all Expectation, and out of the Reach and Power of my Enemies. the Place were ſo Enrag'd at the Tiberians upon This Story of their Barbarous Treachery, that they betook themſelves to their Arms, and Begg'd of Me in a Body, only to March in the Head of them againſt Thoſe Perfidious Wretches, that they might do me Right upon them for ſo Horrid a Villany. The Report of This Outrage was quickly ſpread all over Gallilee, with an Invitation to come in and Joyn with them againſt Tiberias, and to Remit themſelves to the Direction and Conduct of their Governour, to do whatever he ſhould think fit. The Gallilæans gather'd together preſently in Great Numbers; and with Great Earneſtneſs Entreated me to Aſſault Tiberias, and upon the taking of it, Utterly to Demoliſh it; and to Expoſe the Inhabitants with their Whole Families to Sale for Slaves at a Publick Outcry. And This was not the Senſe of the Gallilæans Alone, but my very Friends that came to me out of Tiberias were of the ſame Opinion too. But I was ſo Tender of making my ſelf the Author and Beginner of a Civil War, that I could not bring my ſelf to Reſolve upon thoſe Extremities: And, in Truth, I was very deſirous to put a Stop to the Diſpute before it came to Blows: Beſide that I preſs'd it as their Own Intereſt alſo, not to fall to Cutting one anothers Throats for a Spectacle to the Romans, that were to ſtand looking on. By This means I took off the Edge of the Gallilæans, in the Concluſion; though not without much a-do. When John found that All his Juggling Practices againſt Me ſtill fail'd him, it was High time now, he thought, to look to Himſelf: ſo that taking a-long what Men he had about him, he Quitted Tiberias and went to Giſchala, and from Thence he Wrote me a kind of an Excuſatory, Acknowledging Letter: Setting forth, That it was indeed a very Ill thing done, but without any Privity of his, as he call'd God to Witneſs. He begg'd of me that I would Believe him, with moſt Hideous Oaths and Imprecations in his Letter, to the Truth of what he told me, to a Syllable. But this did not Satisfie the Gallilæans at all; for they knew him too well, for a Perjur'd Wretch, to believe One Word he ſaid, ever the more for his Swearing it: So that they Preſs'd me ſtill, (being a Mighty Body of Men got together) to lead them on to the Aſſault, that they might Deſtroy Him, and Giſchala, the place of his Nativity, both at once. I gave them a Thouſand Thanks for the Reſpect and Good Will they had ſhew'd me; and Aſſured them of all the Beſt Offices I could do them in Requital: but at the Same time, I adviſ'd them by all means to be Temperate, and Patient, and to give me leave to try a little if the Quarrel might not be Taken up without Blood, and to their Liking too, before it came to further Miſchief. The Gallilæans Yielded, and they came ſoon after to Sepphoris. The Inhabitants, being Reſolved to keep Faith with the Romans, were not without ſome Apprehenſion upon My Advance, and ſo Contriv'd for their Own Security, how they might give me a Diverſion ſome Other way. Jeſus, the Head of the Outlaws, was at That time upon the Borders of Ptolemais, with a Body of 800 Men under his Command; and they could not do better, they thought, than preſently to Diſpatch a Meſſenger to him with the Promiſe of a Conſiderable Summ of Money to make War upon us. The Temptation prevail'd; and the way he Pitch'd upon was to take us at Unawares, and Unprovided; and ſo to do the Work by Surprize. Upon This, he ſent word to me by a Meſſenger, that he ſhould be Glad if I would give him leave to make me a Viſit. I made no Difficulty of doing it; for I had no Jealouſie in the World of Foul-Play: So that he took a Troop of his Robbers, and Haſten'd his Journey all he could. But the Deſign Miſcarry'd: For upon his Approach within a little of the Town, I had Intelligence brought me by a Deſerter from him that came over to me, of the Whole Contrivance. Upon This Information, I went directly into the Market-place, as if I had known Nothing of the Plot upon me; and I was there attended with a Numerous Train of Gallilæans in Arms, and ſeveral Tiberians among them. I gave Order then for the Guard of the Paſſes, and to the Porters of the Gates, to let in only Jeſus Himſelf, with ſome few of his Followers, and then ſhut the Gates upon the reſt: Or if they ſhould Attempt to break in by Violence, they ſhould Repell them with Blows too. They did as they were Ordered, and admitted Jeſus with ſome few of his Train, and then ſhut the Gates upon the reſt. So ſoon as he was in, I bad him throw down his Arms, or Expect to Die, which he did, finding himſelf Surrounded with a Guard of Soldiers. Upon This, Thoſe of his Men that were ſhut out, hearing how it was with their Leader, betook themſelves immediately to Flight. So calling Jeſus apart, I told him ſomewhat to This purpoſe: I have you now in my Hands, you ſee; I knew all Your Contrivances, Your Councels, and Your Adviſers; and yet after all Theſe Provocations, if you will paſs Your Word now to be an Honeſt Man, and a Good Subject, for the time to come, all that you have hitherto done ſhall be Forgiven, and Forgotten. He promis'd he would, and ſo I gave him his Liberty, and his Men again, leaving him as I found him. And for the Sepphorites, I only Charg'd them to be Quiet and Peaceable for the Future, at their Peril.

There

There came to Me, at the ſame time, Two Noblemen, and Subjects of the King of Trachonis, with Horſes, Money, and Arms. The Jews were abſolutely againſt the Receiving of them, Unleſs they would be Circumcis'd; but I told them that Every Man was to Worſhip God according to the Rules of his Own Conſcience, not of Another Man's; and therefore I was Utterly againſt the giving of them any Trouble upon That Account: Beſide that it would be an Inhoſpitable Rigour, to make People that came to them for Sanctuary in their Diſtreſs, Repent the Good Opinion they had of their Charity. Upon Diſcourſing the Matter, the Multitude were all of the ſame Mind, and ſo I gave them an Entertainment Suitable to the Circumſtances and Occaſion.

King Agrippa, in the mean Time, ſent (a) Equus Modius with a Conſiderable Force to take in the Caſtle of Magdala. He was not in a Condition to lay Siege to it; but all that he could do was to Poſt Guards upon the Avenues, and ſo to block up Gamala. Æbutius, the Decadarch, that had the Command of the Great Plain, underſtanding that I was come to Simonias, a Village upon the Skirts of Gallilee; and a matter of Sixty Furlongs off from the place where he was; he drew out a Hundred Horſe that he had then about him, near 200 Foot, and ſome Auxiliary Troops from Gaba, and making One Night's Journey of it, came up to the Village; Whereupon I Fac'd him with a Body of the Beſt Men I had. He was too ſtrong for me in Horſe, and would fain have drawn me into the Open Field; but My Strength conſiſting principally in Foot, I found it would not be ſafe to Venture my ſelf upon That Odds of Ground, and ſo kept to my Station. Æbutius did what he could to force me from my Poſt; but when he ſaw it was not to be done with Horſe he Quitted his Deſign, and march'd off to Gaba, with the Loſs only of Three Men in the Action. I follow'd him immediately upon the Heel, with a Body of 2000 Men, and when I came to Beſara, a Town upon the Border of Ptolemais, and ſome 20 Furlongs from Gaba, where Æbutius at That time was, I took Poſſeſſion of all the Paſſes about it, to ſecure my Quarters, and in the mean time carried off the Wheat, and Other Grain, to a Prodigious Quantity, that had been taken from the Neighbouring Villages belonging to Queen Berenice, which was there laid up in Store. This Proviſion I cauſed to be Tranſported to Gallilee upon a Multitude of Camels and Aſſes that I brought thither on purpoſe. So ſoon as this Work was over, I offer'd Æbutius Battle, but when we ſaw he durſt not Venture upon an Engagement, I bent my Courſe toward Neapolitanus, who was then in Garriſon with a Body of Horſe at Scythopolis, and committing Ravage in the Country about Tiberias. By This means I deliver'd Tiberias from any farther Vexation from this Enemy: And my Whole Care was in the Next place how to provide for the Settling of Gallilee.

John Enrag'd at the Reputation and Succeſſes of Joſeph.

Now John the Son of Levi, being, as you have heard, at Giſchala, was Gall'd at the very Soul to ſee Matters go ſo well with me, and to find how much I was Belov'd by my People, and Fear'd by my Enemies: And in the Rancour of This Envy, propoſed to himſelf how he might turn the Hearts of my Subjects againſt me, Solliciting the Tiberians, and the Sepphorites to Join againſt me, and Flattering himſelf, that he might get the Gabarenes to fall off too; Theſe being the moſt Conſiderable People in Gallilee; Inſinuating, how much Eaſier their Condition would be under His Government than they found it in Mine; and reckoning upon it all the while, that juſt ſo much Advantage, or Reputation as I got, He Himſelf Loſt. The Sepphorites were, in truth, neither for Him, nor for Me, but for the Romans. The Tiberians would not be perſwaded to Revolt, but promis'd however to Entertain an Amicable Correſpondence with him; only the Gabarenes Clos'd with him to all purpoſes, by the means of Simon an Eminent Citizen, and a Peculiar Friend and Companion of John's; and they were not altogether Barefac'd neither in their New Alliance, for fear of the Gallilæans, of whoſe Friendſhip, and Reſpect to me they had ſeen ſo many Experiments, but they never fail'd however, of coming in for a part in any Underhand Practices againſt me; and it was very Narrowly that I ſcap'd them upon One Particular Inſtance. There was a Party of Dabarittenians, a parcel of Bold Young Fellows, that upon Intelligence that the Wife of Ptolemy, the King's Intendant, Travelling with a Pompous Train of Horſe and Other Equipage over the Great Plain, out of the King's Juriſdiction into a Province of the Romans; Way-laid, and ſet upon the Company, forc'd the Lady to Shift for her Self, and made Prize of what ſhe had. This paſs'd, while I was at Tarichеæ, and thither they brought Four Mules Laden with Rich Cloaths, and Other Precious Furniture, a Great Number of Silver Veſſels, and 500 Pieces of Gold. Now theſe being the Goods of Ptolemy, a Man of my Own Tribe; (and our Law not allowing us ſo much as to Rob our very Enemies) I told the People that brought them, that they were by any means to be Preſerv'd, till they could be ſold to the Beſt Advantage, and the Money then to be laid laid out upon Repairing the Walls of Jeruſalem. Theſe Ruffians laid it ſo to Heart to be Diſappointed of a Booty, they thought themſelves as good as ſure of, that they gave it out up and down all about Tiberias, that I had a Deſign in my Head to betray the Province to the Romans. I pretended indeed, they ſaid, to Employ the Profit of the Purchaſe upon Rebuilding the Walls of Jeruſalem; but upon the Whole Matter, that my Buſineſs was to Reſtore it to the Former Maſter: and they were not much Wide of the Matter; for after the Departure of the Young Men, I call'd Two Citizens to me of the Firſt Quality; that is to ſay, Daſſion, and Jannæus the Son of Levi, both in Great Eſteem with the King; and Order'd them to make Reſtitution of the Prize; and upon Pain of Death not to Diſcover the Secret to any Mortal. The Rumour was by This time Spread all over Gallilee, that I was in a Conſpiracy to deliver them up to the Romans; and all People were Tamper'd againſt me to take a Revenge. The Men of Taricheæ among Others, gave ſo much Credit to the Story, that they dealt with ſeveral of my Guards, and Other Soldiers, to ſteal away from me in my ſleep, and come into the Circus to Confer there with Other people concern'd, how to Diſpoſe of the Government: When they came thither, they found a Huge Concourſe of People gotten together before-hand; All with one Voice calling out for Juſtice upon the Traytor: But the Ring-leader of the Tumult was Jeſus, the (a) Son of Saphias, who was at That time the Head-Magiſtrate of Tiberias; and one of the Falſeſt, and the moſt Seditious Wretches under the Sun. He Preſented himſelf with the Two Tables of Moſes in his hand, and Preſſing into the Crowd, he Spake to them after This Manner. If ſo it be, Says he, that you have No regard at all to Your Own Good and Safety, let it be recommended to you however to preſerve a Reverence ſtill for theſe Holy-Laws, which that ſame Joſeph, Your Governour, has made No Difficulty to Betray, and Conſequently to render himſelf ſo Odious to all Good Men, that No Puniſhment can be too Exemplary and Severe. Theſe Words were Entertain'd with Acclamations and Applauſes: So that the People Gather'd together, and taking Soldiers along with them; Hurry'd away immediately to My Lodging, with a Full Determination to take away my Life. And there lay I, quite Tir'd, and faſt aſleep, without ſo much as the leaſt Senſe or Thought of a Tumult. But at laſt, all on a Sudden, Simon, one of the Guards, and the Only Man that ſtay'd with me, upon the Sight of a Crowd of People Preſſing in upon me, Rowz'd me up and Wak'd me; Shew'd me the Danger I was in, and Advis'd me in One Word rather to Suffer a Generous Death from my Own hand, than to be Inſulted upon at the Will and Pleaſure of an Inſolent Enemy. Upon This Advice I committed my Self to Providence; Chang'd my Cloaths; Diſguis'd my Self in Black; put on my Sword; and out I went thorough the Middle of the Throng; and ſo by a By-way, where I was ſure to meet none of my Adverſaries, I ſhew'd my Self in the Circus, where I fell upon my face, Weeping and Wailing in ſo Moving a Manner, that the Generality of the Multitude Themſelves could not but Pity me. When I found the Humour of the People in ſome Meaſure wrought upon, and Soften'd, I did what I could to divide them in their Opinions of Me, and of My Condition, before the Return of the Soldiers from my Lodgings. I did not deny it, I told them, but that there was ſomewhat indeed of Truth in the Matter that was Objected againſt me. I deſir'd only that they would firſt Underſtand the Fact, and what Uſe I intended to make of That Booty; and then, if they thought me Worthy of Death, let them take my Life in Gods Name. The Multitude were for Hearing me, and bad me Speak on; only the Soldiers being juſt now return'd, They were for Cutting me to Pieces out of hand: But upon the Clamour of the Common People, and Second Thoughts, they were prevail'd upon to Reſpite the Execution; taking for Granted, that after the Diſcovery, and Confeſſion of the Treaſon, and that I did really Intend to Reſerve That Money for the King, they ſhould have a Better Excuſe and Pretence for going thorough with the Work at laſt; and ſo do the ſame Thing That way as well as the Other. Upon This, they gave me the Hearing, and Silence being Proclaim'd, that which I ſaid was ſhort, and to This Effect.

Men and Brethren, if it ſhall be Your Opinion that I have deſerved to Die, ſo let it be; provided I may but give you a True State of the Caſe I Suffer for, before I go. I have ever look'd upon This City as a Sanctuary to Strangers; and indeed ſo Great, and General a Comfort to Mankind, that betwixt the Conveniences of the Place, and the Agreeable Manners and Converſation of the Inhabitants, Multitudes of People have been prevail'd upon to Quit their Native Soil, and Tranſplanting themſelves hither, to take their Fortunes, Good or Bad with the Countrey: And what's my Crime now, but the Dedicating of a Summ of Money, out of a Zeal to the Publick Service, toward the Repairing of Your Walls? This is, in ſhort, the Ground of your Diſpleaſure. The Taricheans and Foreigners, with Infinite Thanks and Encouragement, bad me go on, and Fear Nothing; but the Gallilæans and Tiberians, on the Other hand, were as Untractable and Out-rageous: So that it came to a Direct Feud betwixt them; the One Side Plying me with Menaces and Hard Words; and the Other Undertaking for My Security and Protection. But upon promising the Tiberians to do as much for Them too, and so likewise for Other Towns, where the Situation would bear it, they let fall the Contest; took my Word for the Performance, and Slipt every Man away, one after another to his Own Home: after which Unexpected, and Wonderful Deliverance, I returned with some Friends, and a matter of Twenty Soldiers, to my Own Quarter. The Ruffians, and the Heads of This Seditious Tumult, finding themselves now in Some Danger to be call'd to an Account for what they had done, gather'd together a matter of 600 of them, and Marched Right-out to the House where I Lodg'd, with a Resolution to set fire to it. Having Notice of their Coming, and of their Purpose, it would have look'd Scandalously Methought, to fly before them: So that I rather Chose to shut the doors against them and make the Best of a Bad Game. Upon This, I call'd to them out of my Window; that if Money was their Business, they had no more to do then, but to appoint any body they thought fit to Receive it, and never Trouble their Heads with any Further Squabble for the Matter. So they sent over a Party to fetch the Money, and upon their Entring the House, finding One Particular Person to be more Insolent and Troublesome than the rest of his Companions, I Order'd him to be Seiz'd, Whipt; One Hand Cut off, and Hang'd about his Neck, and so turn'd out again, to tell his Tale to Those that Employ'd him upon This Errand. The Whole Company was so Surpriz'd at This Treatment, that taking for granted I had a Strong Guard in my House, they all Scour'd away immediately for fear of being Serv'd with the same Sawce; and by this Stratagem, I brought my self off for This Bout. After This Disappointment, they had recourse to Another Invention (as they would never be without some Pretext or Other to Move the Multitude). They Pick'd a Quarrel with the Two Noblemen, that apply'd themselves in their Distress to Me for Sanctuary. They were Spyes and Poysoners, they said, and not to be Protected in any Place where they would not Conform to the Fashions of the Countrey. This Popular way of Hint and Insinuation, put the Multitude into their Freaks again; but upon hearing which way it wrought, I told them plainly that it was not either Generous or Discreet, to Provoke, and to Insult upon People that cast themselves upon Us for Succour; for We did not know how soon Their Case might come to be our Own. And then to fancy their Coming hither to Poyson us, Nothing could be more Ridiculous; for what should the Romans be at the Charge for, of Maintaining so many Legions in Arms, and in Pay, when there would need no more, if they were That way given, than a Spell, or a Bolus, to do the Work? This Pacify'd them a little for the Present; but their Choler was up again immediately: Insomuch that away they went with a Band of Desperate Ruffians together to Taricheæ, to Beset the Lodgings of These Strangers and fall upon their Persons. In the very Instant of hearing what they were about, I got what Men I could together, and so Posted away with all Possible Speed to prevent the Mischief; for the Sufferance of so Barbarous an Inhumanity would have made me Odious to Mankind. Briefly I made a Shift to get up time enough to Shut the Door and make Good the House till I could run a Trench from the backside into the Lake there at hand, where I took a Boat, and so Cross'd over to the Borders of the Hippenians, with my Two Noble Guests aboard, where I allow'd them the Value of their Horses, which in such a Hurry they could not take along with them: and for a Farewell, earnestly besought them to bear their Present Lot with Constancy and Honour. It went to the very Heart of me to do a thing so like Treachery, as to deliver up any Man to the Mercy of an Enemy's Countrey that had thrown himself into My Arms, in Confidence of Good Faith and Protection; but of the Two, I rather Chose, how Hazardous soever, to leave them to Providence one way, than to a Certain Destruction by the Perfidy of my Own People, the Other. But after all This, they were preserv'd at last; Agrippa Pardon'd them; and This was the End of These Broils.

The People of Tiberias offer their service to Agrippa.

The Tiberians having it now in their Heads to go over to King Agrippa, offer'd him their Service by Letter, provided he would furnish them with Troops sufficient to Protect them. Upon the First Notice of This Overture, I went to look after them, and upon my Arrival, they Minded me of my Promise for the Rebuilding of their Walls, being Enformed, it seems, that I had been as good as my Word at Taricheæ, already. I told them it should be done, and gave Orders for the providing of Materials, and Work-men to go in hand with it immediately. After Three days Stay there, I made a Journey to Taricheæ some Thirty Furlongs off: In which time it so happen'd that Certain Roman Troops being upon their March within Sight of Tiberias, the Inhabitants took them to be of Agrippa's Party, falling presently into the Highest Admiration of the King in the World: And at the Same time Reflecting upon Me as Bitterly and and Contemptuouſly as was Poſſible. The Next News I heard, was brought me by a Meſſenger in Great Haſt, that the People were upon the very Point of a Revolt, which put me to my Wits End what to do. For the Sabbath being now at hand, I had Diſmiſs'd the Soldiers from Taricheæ for the Quieter Celebration of the Feſtival: Beſide that I ſeldom kept a Guard about me in That Place, in Confidence of the Try'd Loyalty, and Good Affection of the People: So that having only ſeven Soldiers, and ſome few Friends about me, I found my ſelf in a Great Perplexity What Courſe to Take. It would have been to No purpoſe to Recall my Troops now in the Evening, which I could have No Uſe at all of the Next day: And then for the People of Taricheæ, Strangers and all, If I could have Engaged them to my Aſſiſtance, as perhaps I might, by the hope and promiſe of Pillage and Booty, they would not have been Sufficient yet at laſt to have done My Buſineſs: And there was No room for Conſideration, or Delay; for fear of the Enemies Prepoſſeſſing the City in the Interim, and Shutting Me out: So that I bethought my Self of This Invention: I gave it in Charge to ſome of my very Particular and Truſty Friends, to keep a Strict Eye upon the Gates, and not Suffer any Creature to paſs out of the Town. They were likewiſe to appoint the Heads of the Chief Families in the City, Every Man to Mount his Boat, and put out into the Lake, with only One Mariner to Every Bark, and ſo to follow Me, While I my Self with ſeven Soldiers and ſome few of my Friends, in Another Boat ſtood away to rights for Tiberias; where the People were by This time Informed of their Miſtake; and that there were no Troops of the Kings at hand, as they Imagin'd. The Inhabitants Seeing the Lake however cover'd over with Veſſels, and Surmiſing Nothing leſs than an Army aboard ready to break in upon the City; betook themſelves, upon This Fright, and Second Thoughts, to Other Meaſures. For they laid down their Arms, and coming out with their Wives and Children, and with all the Submiſſion in the World, they Joy'd me of my Arrival; Wiſh'd me Succeſs in my Undertakings, and Invited me into their City: Little Dreaming all this while that the Plot was Diſcover'd. Upon drawing near the Shore; I gave Order for all my Followers to come to an Anchor So far from Land, that the People might not Diſcern This Formidable Fleet at ſuch a Diſtance to be only An Amuſement of Empty Boats. In the mean time I came up my Self to the very Key; and after a Rebuke Severe enough, for the Wickedneſs and Folly of their Breach of Faith, I was content yet in the End to paſs it all over, upon Condition that they ſhould ſend me aboard Ten of the Beſt Men they had for a Caution; which they did at firſt Word, and by This Trick I got the Whole Senate, and a Great part of their Principal Citizens, one after another by little and little into my Hand. The Remainder of the Multitude reflecting upon the Condition they now were in, caſt the Fault wholly upon one Clitus, a Bold, Hot Headed Fellow among them, as the Chief Incendiary, and deſir'd me that I would Command Juſtice to be done upon him. I could not in Conſcience put a Man of my Own Tribe to Death, and yet lying under an Abſolute Neceſſity of making him Exemplary, Some way or Other, I Commanded one Levi, a Soldier in my Guards, to Cut off one of his hands. The Fellow durſt not Venture upon it Alone, for fear of the People; and I was as much affraid on the Other Side, leaſt the People ſhould take Notice of his Boggling at the Execution. So that without any more ado, I called out to Clitus my Self. Come, ſaid I, Thou Baſeſt of Men, I do here Condemn thee to the Loſs of Both thy hands for thy Ingratitude and Treachery, and, as much as in thee lyes, to be thine Own Executioner, wherefore be Quick and Diſpatch, or thou ſhalt not come off ſo. The Man begg'd hard to be Excus'd for One of them, and after ſome Seeming Difficulty having Obtain'd it, he forth-with Cut off his Left hand with his Right to ſave the Other, and This put an End to the Tumult. From hence I return'd to Taricheæ; leaving the Tiberians in Great Admiration at the putting of a Stop to So Furious an Uproar, without Blood-ſhed: Matters being now Quiet, I ſent for the Tiberian Priſoners, to Eat with me; Juſtus and his Father Piſtus among the Reſt. I was ſaying in the Freedom of Table Diſcourſe, that I look'd upon the Romans as the Greateſt People under the Sun; but yet in regard of the Preſent Faction I had to do withal, I reckon'd it Good Diſcretion to keep My thoughts to My Self; and it would be Well if They did ſo too, I thought, till Times ſhould be Better; and in the mean while to live Quiet under my Adminiſtration; for they ſhould never find any Governour Eaſier to them than my Self. So I Minded Juſtus of the Gallilæans cutting off the hands of his Brother upon a Pretence of Forgery, and before my coming from Jeruſalem; and likewiſe how the Gamalites upon a Diſpute they had with the Babylonians after Philip's Departure, put his Kinſman Chares to Death: Whereas I had not Treated his Brother in Law Jeſus, I told him, at That Barbarous rate. This was the Subſtance of what paſs'd at Supper, and the Next Morning Early, Juſtus and his Companions were all Diſcharg'd.

It was a little before This, that Philip the Son of Jacim, went away from Gamala, upon This Account. News being brought him of the Revolt of Varus from Agrippa, and Modius Equus, his very Good Friend, put in his Place, he gave Modius to underſtand by Letter, how it was with him, and the Preſent State of his Affairs, with a Pacquet alſo for the King and the Queen, Who were then at Berytus. Modius was Overjoy'd to find him in Health, and in ſo good a Condition, and ſent away the Other Pacquet according to the Addreſs. So ſoon as the King perceived by Theſe Letters, that the Story of Philip's putting himſelf in the Head of the Jews againſt the Romans, was a Falſe Report, he ſent for him to Court by a Party of Horſe; and taking him into his Arms upon his Arrival with Great Honour and Kindneſs, told the Commanders about him, that This was the Perſon they heard was gone off from the Romans. He ſent him ſoon after This, with ſome Troops of Horſe to the Fort of Gamala; with Inſtructions to bring away all his Family; Re-ſettle the Babylonians in Batanæa, and to take all Poſſible Care to keep the People Quiet. Philip had no ſooner receiv'd his Orders, but away he went immediately upon his Commiſſion. About This time, up ſtarted a kind of a Quack Doctor, whoſe Name was Joſeph, with a Crew of Mad Young Rogues at his Heels, and not without ſome Conſiderable Citizens in the Medly, for the Better Countenancing of the Tumult. The Buſineſs of This Mountebank was to Debauch the People from their Allegiance, by Encouraging them to take up Arms, and with Sword in hand to Aſſert their Ancient Rights and Liberties. The Faction grew quickly to ſuch a Head, that it was Certain Death to Oppoſe them; as in This Riot they killed Chares, and his Kinſman Jeſus with the Siſter of Juſtus of Tiberias, of whom we have ſpoken already. They wrote to me after This, to ſend them Troops for a Garriſon, and Workmen to run up a Wall about the Town, which I agreed to, both the One, and the Other.

At the Same time the Countrey of the Gaulanites fell off from Agrippa, as far as the Village Solyma. I Wall'd in Sogannis, and Seleucia, Two very Strong Places by Situation; and I Fortify'd Several Towns in the Upper Gallilee, as Jamnia, Amerytha, and Charabe, among the Rocky Mountains. In Gallilee I Fortify'd the Towns alſo of Tarricheæ, Tiberias, and Sepphoris, and the Villages of the Cave of Arbela, Berſobe, Selame, Jotapata, Capharath, Comoſogona, Næpapha, and the Mount Itabyr. This Proſperous Courſe of my Affairs was Such an Eye-Sore to John the Son of Levi, that he took up a Reſolution Some way or Other, at what rate ſoever to Deſtroy me: So that after the Walling in of Giſchala, he ſent away his Brother Simon with a Hundred Men to Simon the Son of Gamaliel, at Jeruſalem, to try if he could get the Council of the City to remove me from my Goverment, and to Subſtitute John in My Place. Now This Simon was a Citizen of the Firſt Rank; by Sect, a Phariſee, and conſequently a Strict Obſerver of the Laws of Moſes; a Perſon of Extraordinary Prudence, and No Man better Qualify'd for the Obviating of any Difficulty at a Pinch: over and above that he was John's Ancient and Particular Friend, and at That time known to be my Enemy. He was, in ſhort, ſo far Wrought upon by Sollicitation and Entreaty, that he put it in the Head of the High Prieſt, Ananus, and Jeſus the Son of Gamala, with Others of the Party, to have a care of me betimes, before I got up to be too Strong for them; for they were Highly concern'd, he ſaid, to have Me turn'd out of the Command of Gallilee, and to ſee it done without Delay too, before the Deſign could take Air; for fear of My preventing the Execution of it, by falling in upon them with a Powerful Army. Ananus the High Prieſt told him on the Other hand, that I had ſo many of the High Prieſts and Heads of the People, that could bear Witneſs to the Conduct and Juſtice of my Adminiſtration, that it would be a Hard Matter to Obtain a Vote againſt me: Neither would it appear Reaſonable to proceed to a Judgment upon any Man without Aſſigning his Crime. So Simon deſir'd them to make No Words at all of what had paſs'd, but leave it to Him to take care for the Diſplacing of me ſome Other way. Upon This he apply'd himſelf to the Brother of John, and propos'd the Diſtribution of Money and Preſents among the Friends of Ananus, as the moſt likely Courſe he could take for the Gaining of his Point. By This Method, in fine, Simon compaſſed his End; for Ananus and his Companions, upon the Receiving of Theſe Bribes, laid their Heads together immediately how they might Depoſe Me from my Government, and without making ſo much as any one Man beſide, Privy to the Counſel, the way they Pitch'd upon was to Employ Four Agents upon the Commiſſion; Two of them Noble, and the Other Two, Private Perſons; but all Four Equally Qualify'd, for their Learning, and Skill in the Law; as there was (a) Jonathan, and Ananias; Both Phariſees, for Two of them: (b) Jozar, a Man of a Sacerdotal Family, and a Phariſee alſo, for a Third; and then the Fourth was Simon, of the Pontifical Line too, and the Youngeſt of the Four. Theſe Men had their Inſtructions ctions given them to Reaſon the Matter at the Next Meeting of the Gallilæans, with the Members of the Aſſembly, and to Expoſtulate, why they ſhould Chuſe Me before Another. If they ſhould ſay becauſe I am a Native of Jeruſalem; it might be Anſwer'd, So were They: And then for my Knowledge of the Laws, the ſame Thing might be ſaid for Them too, or if they ſhould ſay they did it out of a reſpect to the Prieſt-hood, they might make Anſwer that Two of their Number had the very ſame Pretence. With This Leſſon, and 40000 Pieces of Silver out of the Publique Treaſury, Jonathan, and his Companions, went away about their Buſineſs. There came at This time one Jeſus a Gallilæan, with a band of 600 Soldiers to Jeruſalem; with whom Theſe Commiſſioners agreed for Three-Months-Pay-Advance to follow Jonathan, and his Colleagues, and to Obey Them, and Their Orders; Joyning to Theſe Soldiers 300 Mercenaries more out of the City. With This Train the Deputies went their way; and the Brother of John with his Company of 100 Men along with them. Their Order was This; In Caſe I ſhould Voluntarily lay down my Arms, to take me Priſoner, and ſend me Alive to Jeruſalem; but upon any Oppoſition, they were to Kill me out of hand; and their Order ſhould bear them out in it. There were Letters diſpatcht away to John alſo to be in Readineſs to make War upon me. And the Sepphorites, the Gabarenes, and the Tiberians, were likewiſe Engaged to fall in with the Party. Now Jeſus the Son of Gamala, that wiſh'd me Well, and was Privy to the Whole Contrivance, ſent my Father Word, it ſeems, from time to time, of Every thing that paſs'd, and from Him I receiv'd a Particular Account of the Whole Matter. It went to the Heart of me to Conſider the Ingratitude, and Malicious Practices of a Faction in the City againſt me; and my Affliction was not much leſs neither to find the Trouble my Father was in for My ſake, and with what Earneſtneſs he Preſs'd me to come over to him, upon a ſuggeſtion that it was Only to ſee me yet once again before he dy'd. I took my Friends into Counſel with me upon This Whole Affair, and told them that I had reſolved within the Compaſs of Three Days, to lay down my Command, and go back again into my Country. They all fell into Tears and Lamentations upon the Hearing of it; begging of me, not a upon any Terms to Leave them to the Certainty of Periſhing when I was gone. But my Life being at ſtake on the One hand, againſt their Prayers and Importunities on the Other, I ſtill perſiſted in my Purpoſe. The Gallilæans had ſuch an Apprehenſion of being Over-run and Deſtroy'd by the Thieves and Out-Laws, after my Departure, that they preſently ſent Notice up and down thorough the whole Province that I was upon the Point of Leaving them. This News brought a World of People together, with their Wives and Children into the Great Plain of (a) Aſoch, where I then was, to try if they could get me to ſtay; Not ſo much out of an Affection to Me perhaps, as for fear of the Danger they were in Themſelves; for they reckon'd all to be ſafe ſo long as I was among them.

A Plot upon Joſeph.

Joſeph's Father ſends him Intelligence of it.

Joſeph would have Quitted Gallilee, but the People would not part with him.

It was a Wonderful Dream I had That very Night. As I was in my Bed, my Heart ſad, and my Head Extremely Troubled. Upon the Receit of Theſe Letters from my Father, I had the Viſion of a Man at my Bed Side, and a Voice ſpeaking to me after This manner. Comfort thy Heart Good Man, and Fear Nothing; for all Theſe Calamities will blow over, and only Lead to thy Greater Advantage and Satisfaction; not only for the Preſent, but likewiſe for the time to come; Wherefore ſtand Firm, and remember that I told you beforehand, that you were to have a War with the Romans. Upon Waking out of This Dream, I got up with an Intent to go out into the Air, and I had no ſooner ſhew'd my ſelf at the door toward the Plain, but a World of the Gallilæans, Men, Women, and Children, caſt themſelves down upon their Faces at the very ſight of me, and with Tears and Supplications beſought me not to Leave them in This Extremity, at the Mercy of their Enemies. When they found Prayers and Importunities would do no Good, they preſs'd me with Adjurations not to forſake them, and with many a Heavy Curſe upon the People of Jeruſalem, that would never let them be Quiet. This to me was ſo ſad a Hearing, and ſo Rueful a Spectacle, that it made my very Heart Bleed to conſider the Diſtreſs of ſo many Thouſands of Miſerable Creatures, and brought me over, in the End, to a Reſolution of running any Hazard Whatſoever for the Service of ſo Vaſt a Multitude of Forlorn, Harmleſs People: So that in the Concluſion, I was over-perſuaded to ſtay. Upon This, I bad them draw me Five Thouſand Men out of their Whole Number, and furniſh them with Arms and Victuals for a March, the reſt immediately to Depart every Man to his Own Home. So ſoon as This Five Thouſand was ready, I Join'd them with Three Thouſand more that I had of my Own, and Eighty Horſe; and ſo Advanc'd with them to Chabolo, a Village upon the Borders of Ptolemais where I took up my Station, as if my Deſign had been to fall upon Placidus whom Ceſtius Gallus had ſent into Thoſe parts with a Troop of Horſe and Two Companies of Foot, to Burn all the Villages of the Gallilæans thereabouts. Placidus Intrench'd himſelf not far from the Walls of Ptolemais, while I lay at the ſame time a Matter of ſixty Furlongs toward Chabolo. We drew out ſeveral times on Both ſides, with a Countenance of Puſhing it immediately to a Battle; but there paſs'd only ſome Few skirmiſhes, and That was All: For the more I preſs'd the bringing of it to a Combat, the more the Other Declin'd it; not daring to ſhew his Head out of Protection of the Town.

While Matters were in This Poſture, John and his Companions came into Thoſe Parts, the Perſons who as I told you, were ſent to Jeruſalem by the Faction of Simon, and Ananus the High Prieſt: And the Plot was now how to Compaſs their Ends by Treachery, which they durſt not Attempt by Downright Force. To This purpoſe they laid their Heads together, and Sent me This Following Letter.

Jonathan and his Deputy-Colleagues from the Council at Jeruſalem, to Joſeph, Greeting.

Jonathan's Letter to Joſeph.

WHereas our Principals are given to Underſtand that John of Giſchala hath been Engaged in ſeveral Perfidious Practices againſt Your Perſon, they have ſent Me in Their Name to give him a ſevere Reproof for ſo doing, and to require him for the future to pay all Reſpect and Obedience to your Commands. And to the end that We may agree upon ſome Better Proviſion for the Regulation of Things hereafter; we make it our Requeſt that You will come hither to us with all ſpeed; The Village is but ſmall; and therefore we deſire you will not bring any Great Train along with you, for fear of being ſcanted for room.

This Letter was a Dangerous Dilemma upon me: For if I truſted my ſelf without a Strong Guard, they might take me up, and uſe me as they pleas'd: and on the Other hand, if I Marched with the Formality of Military Troops, I might be liable to be Proſecuted as a Rebel. This Letter was brought me by a Horſeman; a Daring Young-Man, that had been formerly in the King's Service. It was now pretty Late in the Night, and being at Supper with ſome of my Friends, and ſeveral Gallilæans of Quality about me, word was brought me at the Table, of a Certain Jew on Horſe-back, that deſir'd to ſpeak with me, I bad he ſhould be call'd in; and accordingly he came, and without any manner of reſpect to the Company, he deliver'd me the Letter, which he brought, he ſaid, from the Jeruſalem-Deputies, and it requir'd an Immediate Anſwer: for he was to be back again preſently. The Company were all amaz'd at the Confidence of the Soldier; but however I ſpake to him to ſit down, and take part of a Collation with us; but he Excus'd himſelf, and ſo Keeping the Letter in my Hand, without Opening it, I took Occaſion to While away time with my Company upon Diſcourſes by the By, and paſſing now and then out of the door, as in Civility to ſome of my Gueſts that were going to bed, I took the Opportunity, when I was out of Sight, to Break up the Letter, and run it over with my Eye ſo as to Gueſs at the Contents of it; and then Inſtantly folding it up again, I held it ſtill in my hand, as before; without Diſcovering that I had read it. The Company was now all gone but Four Intimate Friends, and a Boy to fill the Wine. I gave the Soldier Twenty Drachma's for a Gratuity, and he was ſo Wonderfully Thankful for it, that I found the Love of Money was his Weak Side, and ſo I reſolv'd to Attaque him on That Quarter. Come, ſaid I, if you will drink with us, and do as We do, you ſhall have a Drachma for Every Cup you take. The Fellow was very well content to Drink upon The Terms, of the more Drink the more Money, and ſwill'd himſelf ſo Brutiſhly Drunk, that Out came the whole Myſtery of the Villany, without ſo much as Pumping; for he told me of his Own Accord, that there was a ſnare laid for me, and a Sentence of Death pronounc'd againſt me: Upon which Diſcovery, I gave him This following Anſwer to his Letter.

The Meſſenger Diſcovers the Treachery.

Joſeph's Anſwer to Jonathan.

I Am very glad to hear that you are in Health, and that you are come into Gallilee: and the rather, becauſe I am diſpoſing my ſelf for a Journey into my Own Country, which I have been a Long time thinking of; and This will be a Fair Opportunity for my Delivering up the Care of the Publick Adminiſtration into Your Hands. I ſhould think my ſelf happy to Wait upon you, not only at Xallo, but a great deal further, even without any Other Motive to Invite me to it. But alas! I am not now at Liberty for ſuch a journey, being forced to ſtay at Chabolo to Obſerve the Motions of Placidus, and keep him him from Breaking into Gallilee; and therefore I think it more Adviſable, upon the Receit of This Letter, for you to come hither: And ſo I bid you farewel.

This Letter I deliver'd to the Soldier, and Order'd 30 Perſons of the Beſt Quality among the Gallilæans to go along with him, giving them Orders only to do their Reverence to the Deputies, without Mentioning One Word of Bus'neſs: And I ſet one of my Own Soldiers that I could beſt Confide in, for a Spy upon each of the Other, to Watch them Narrowly if they Entertain'd any Private Converſation with Jonathan. After the Departure of Theſe People; the Deputies finding that their Firſt Plot did not Take, wrote a Second Letter to me to This following Effect.

The Meſſenger Diſmiſs'd, and 30 Perſons of Quality along with him.

Joſeph makes one of them a ſpy upon all the reſt.

Jonathan, and his Colleagues to Joſeph, Greeting.

THIS is to require you to appear within Three Days from the Date hereof, before us at (a) Gabara, without any Guard of Soldiers to Attend you, to make good the Charge that you have Exhibited againſt John of Giſchala.

A peremptory ſummons to Joſeph to appear at Gabara.

After the Reception of the Gallilæans, and the Writing of This Letter, they went to Japha, one of the Largeſt, Strongeſt, and moſt Populous Villages of Gallilee. They were no ſooner Enter'd the Place, but the People were all up with Open Mouth, Men, Women, and Children, crying out to bid them be gone again, and to let them alone, While they were well; for they would never Own any other Governour than Joſeph. This was the Voice of the Whole Multitude, One and All. So that the Deputies finding That was not a place for their Turn, went their way to Sepphoris, the Faireſt City of all Gallilee, and a People well affected to the Romans. Many of the Citizens went out of the Town indeed to Receive them; but without One Word ſpeaking of Me, either Good or Bad: And from thence they went * to Aſoch, where they had the ſame Entertainment as before at Japha. Theſe Contempts made them ſo Out-ragious, that they Order'd the Soldiers to Quiet them, with Clubs and Cudgells: They went forward to Gabara, where they were Joyn'd by John with a Body of 3000 Men to Second them. Now being forewarn'd of the Practices that were a foot againſt me, I drew out 3000 Soldiers, and took them along with me to Jotapata, ſome Forty Stadia from the Place, to be within diſtance of Communicating upon any Occaſion with the reſt, which I left behind me in the Camp, under the Command of a Truſty Friend. And from thence I wrote the Deputies This following Letter.

The People one and All, for Joſeph, and no Other Governour.

If you find it ſo Abſolutely Neceſſary for Me to come to you; there are Four Hundred Cities and Villages in Gallilee, Name any one of the Four Hundred, and I will Meet you there, ſaving only Gabara, and Giſchala; the One of them is the Place of John's Nativity; and the Other of his Allyance. The Deputies gave over Writing, upon the Receipt of This Letter, and Conferr'd Notes with their Friends, John himſelf being one of the Council, how to do my Buſineſs ſome Other way. John was for ſending Circulatory Letters to all the Towns and Villages of Gallilee, upon a Preſumption of finding ſome One or more in every Place that would be forward enough to do me any Ill Office, and Eaſily Suborn'd to Joyn in an Information againſt me as a Publique Enemy: Now there would need no more toward the Gaining of the Citizens of Jeruſalem over to the Opinion of my being an Enemy to the Gallilæans, than to ſend them Theſe Atteſtations well Certify'd, which would Undoubtedly have put me out of Credit with That People. The Reſolution being taken, Sacchæus, a Deſerter brought me a Particular Account late at night of the whole Tranſaction.

Joſeph to the Deputies.

The Deputies Plot the Deſtruction of Joſeph.

Sacchæus acquaints Joſeph with the Whole Contrivance.

I found I had now no time to ſpare; ſo that I call'd for Jacob immediately (a Brave Man and my True Friend) and ſent him away with 200 Men upon the Scout, betwixt Gallilee and Gabara, with Inſtructions to take up what Paſſengers he thought fit and ſend them to me in Cuſtody: Eſpecially if they had any Letters about them: And at the ſame time I diſpatch'd Jeremy (my very Particular Friend too) with 600 Soldiers Another way, to watch the Paſſes from Jeruſalem into Gallilee, and with Orders to Seize All Letter Carriers, Committing the Men to priſon, and bringing Me their Papers. I ſent abroad my Mandates alſo through the Whole Province of Gallilee, requiring all perſons to attend me at Gabara the Next Morning, with their Arms and Three days Proviſions. The Soldiers I had about me I diſtributed into Four Bodies under the Choiceſt Officers I had to Command them, with a ſtrict Order not ſo much as to Admit a ſtrange Face into their Company. About Eleven Next day, coming to Gabara, I found the Whole Plain before the Town, Cover'd with Armed Troups out of Gallilee, to my Aſſiſtance; beſide a Confuſed Multitude of Country People. Juſt as I was beginning to ſay ſome what to them, my Mouth was ſtopt with ſuch Out-cries of Rejoy-

Rejoycing that there was Nothing to be heard but Shouts and Acclamations at the Sight of their Benefactor, and Preserver, as they thought fit to call me: And This was the Unanimous Voice of the Whole Company. I gave them my Acknowledgements for This Instance of their Good Will and Respect, but desired them at the Same time to make an Innocent, and a Temperate Use of their Power, without Wronging any Creature, either in their Persons, or their Goods. They had Provision enough I told them for the Present Occasion; and there was Nothing my Heart was so much Set upon, as to put an End to the Tumult without Blood.

Joseph Waylays the Roads for Passengers, and Letters.

The Men made Prisoners, and the Letters carry'd to Joseph.

The People I had Employ'd to Way-lay the Roads, had the Good Fortune, the very First day they went out, to Intercept Jonathan's Messengers in their way toward Jerusalem; together with their Pacquets. They made the Men Prisoners, according to My Order, and brought Me the Letters; which I found upon the Perusal to be Stuff'd with Calumnious and Scurrilous Invectives against my Self. I took No Notice at all of the Matter, but kept on my Journey directly toward them as if Nothing had been. So soon as ever they Understood I was upon my March That Way, they retir'd Every Man of them, John and all, into the House of Jesus; a Large and a Strong Place, and built much after the manner of a Cittadel. They kept a Party of Soldiers Privately in the House; all the Gates Shut but One, and the Guards Order'd, that upon My coming thither (as they Expected a Visit from me) to take me in alone, and not One Man of my Train to follow me: By which means they made no doubt of getting me Absolutely into their Power. But by Great Providence, having some Light and Jealousy of the Treachery, I went immediately upon my Arrival, to a Lodging over against the House, and so the Plot was Disappointed. I pretended to be very Weary and Sleepy, and the Deputies depending upon it that I had laid my Self to rest, went out into the Plain to Debauch the Multitude, and to Possess them with both an Envy, and a Hatred of Me and My Administration. But Matters wrought quite Another way than they Imagin'd; for the Gallilæans had no sooner got Sight of the Deputies, but they fell foul upon them with Clamours and Reproaches. They had Done no wrong, they said, and they would Take None; and so bad them begone about their Business, and meddle with what they had to do withal. As for their Governour; they had a very Good one already, they said, and Him they were resolv'd to Stick to. Upon This Encouragement, I took the People in the Good Humour, and went out into the Field to Understand what Jonathan and his Complices had to say. The Multitude had no sooner set Eye on me, but they came Thronging about me with all the Demonstrations of Joy, Satisfaction and Acknowledgment, in their Looks, Words, and Actions, Imaginable, Amplifying upon the Obligations I had laid upon them, to such a degree, that Jonathan and his Fellows could not think themselves Safe under so Violent a Prejudice. They would fain have Slipt away, I perceiv'd; but upon My Entreaty they Stay'd; (that is to say in truth, there was no getting off:) So that there they stood in an Amazement, like so many Stocks, without Sense, or Reason. Upon This, I Quieted the Noise, Set Guards of the Best Men I had upon all the Avenues for fear of any Incursion or Surprize; and so with my People about me in Arms, I Address'd my Self to the Deputies. I minded them in the First place of a Letter they had sent me; pretending a Commission from Jerusalem to Hear and Determine upon certain Matters in Controversy betwixt John, and my Self, producing the Letter at the Same time in Proof of my Suggestion. Now put the Case, said I to Jonathan, that You and your Companions had any pretence to call Me to an Account for the Manage of my Government, upon John's Information or Complaint, would not You Your selves pronounce me Innocent, upon the Clear Testimony of Two or Three Witnesses of Unquestionable Probity, in my Justification? But what will you say now if I appeal, not only to Two or Three Competent Vouchers; but to Every Soul that is here Present, whether I have behav'd my Self or not, both in my Private Conversation, and in the Exercise of my Function, as became a Person of Honour and Justice? As for You, Good People of Gallilee, speak the Truth and the Whole Truth I Adjure you, as if you were Sworn Evidences in the Cause, and These Men the Judges. Pray tell them, and Spare not, the Worst you know of me. The Words were hardly out of my Mouth; but the Whole Multitude with One Voice and Consent made a Frank Open Declaration of the Comforts and Benefits they had Enjoy'd under my Care and Protection, as their Benefactor and Defender; and that they were so well satisfy'd with me for what was past, that they Wish'd no more than the Continuance of the same Goodness for the time to come: Affirming also with Oaths, that I had been likewise as Tender, of either Offering, or Suffering any Violence, upon the Persons of their Wives and Daughters, as I had been of Invading the Common Freedom and Propriety of the Subject. I read, after This, in the hearing of a great many Gallilæans, the Two Intercepted Letters of Jonathan, that were brought me by my Scouts. They were False, Scandalous, Joseph reads Jonathan's Two Scandalous Letters.

Scandalous, and Impudent, to the Higheſt degree, and giving me the Character of a Tyrant rather than a Governour, with a great deal of ſhameleſs Ribaldry over and above. I was not willing to let my Enemies know that I had their Meſſengers in Cuſtody, for fear it ſhould hinder them from ſending That way ſome Other time: So that I pretended they were brought over to me Voluntarily by the Meſſengers Themſelves. The Inſolence and Villainy of Theſe Two letters put the People into ſuch a Heat and Out-rage, againſt Jonathan, and his Fellows, that they were ready to Tear them to Pieces; and they had Undoubtedly done Execution upon them, if I had not in the very Height of their Rage prevented it. So I gave the Deputies their Liberty, and their Pardon, both together; upon Condition that they would Repent and Mend; which they promis'd to do, and ſo I diſmiſs'd them to their Own Homes again; bidding them ſpeak no otherwiſe of My Government, than as they found it. With Theſe Words, I gave them their Diſcharge: But taking for granted beforehand, that they would never Do as they ſaid. The People were ſo Implacably bent upon the Ruine of Theſe men, that all the Skill and Intereſt I had was little enough to prevent it. How did they beg of Me, only to be turn'd looſe upon them! But when a Sedition is once a-foot, No body knows where it will ſtop: So that I did what I could to Divert them; but in the rage of This Impatience, they took up a reſolution, One and all, to fall upon Jonathan in his Quarters.

The People in Such a Rage at them that they were ready to Tear Jonathan and his Fellows to pieces.

When I ſaw there was No Reſtraining them I took Horſe Immediately, and bad them follow me to Sogane, a Village of Arabia, ſome Forty Stadia Diſtance, and by This Artifice I ſcap'd the Scandal of making my ſelf the Author of a Civil War. When we were Advanc'd within a little of the Place, I Order'd my Troops to make an Halt; and after a Few Words of Neceſſary Precaution to them, not to be Intemperate, and Vindictive, I made a Cull of a Hundred of the Beſt Men for Quality and Underſtanding that I could pick out of the Whole Number, and Bad them prepare themſelves for a Journey to Jeruſalem, with a Complaint againſt the Seditious Heads, and Ring-leaders of Theſe Broils. I gave them moreover in Charge, that if they found the People Well-Inclin'd, and Eaſy to me, they ſhould Endeavour to procure me a New Commiſſion for my Continuance in the Command of Gallilee, and to get John recall'd. With Theſe Orders I Diſpatch'd them away on the Third day after This Meeting, and gave them 500 Soldiers for their Convoy. I wrote alſo to my Friends at Samaria to grant my Commiſſioners a Safe and a Free Paſſage thorough their Country; for the City was at That time under the Power of the Romans, and This was the ſhorteſt Cutt to make a Three days-Journey of it to Jeruſalem. I Conducted them my ſelf to the Frontiers of Gallilee, and ſet ſuch Watches upon the way, that there was little Notice of This Expedition: After which I made a Short ſtay at Japha.

Joſeph ſends Commiſſioners to Jeruſalem with a Complaint againſt the Rioters.

Jonathan and his Companions, finding themſelves wholly Diſappointed, ſent back John to Giſchala, and They Themſelves went in the mean time to Tiberias, in hope to Prepoſſeſs themſelves of That Place: Jeſus being the Chief Magiſtrate there, and having Undertaken by Letters to bring the People over to Their Intereſt: In confidence of having This made good to them, they Undertook the Journey. But Silas, my Lieutenant there, ſent me word from time to time how Every thing proceeded, and preſs'd me back again by all means with what ſpeed I could. I follow'd his Counſel, and by ſo doing fell into a ſtrait that had like to have Coſt me my life.

Jonathan ſends John to Giſchala, and goes himſelf to Tiberias.

Jonathan and his Companions having made a Dangerous Faction againſt me in Tiberias, were not a little Startled upon my coming thither; but gave me the Complement however of a Viſit, Joying me over and over of the Reputation I had gotten in the World by the Conduct and Juſtice of my Adminiſtration in Gallilee; and not without Aſſuming to Themſelves ſome ſhare in the Honour of it, both as their Fellow-Citizen, and in ſome ſort their Diſciple; Profeſſing all along that they had much a Greater Kindneſs for Me than for John; adviſing me without any more ado, to go back again, and depend upon Them for the Delivering of John into My hands very ſuddenly; and to This they Bound Themſelves with Oaths and Imprecations, ſo Sacred, and Dreadful, that I muſt have been a Villain not to Believe them: After which, They deſir'd me by all means to draw-off to ſome Other Place, Suggeſting for the Better Countenance of the Matter, that the Sabbath was coming on, and they ſhould be very ſorry to have the people fall into any Diſorder on That day. Upon This Pretence, I went my way to Taricheæ, not Suſpecting any Thing; but yet for Better Security ſake, I planted my Spyes and Informers up and down in the Town to Watch and Hearken-out what was ſaid and Done concerning Me: And I had my Agents all along the road too from Taricheæ, to Tiberias, to bring me the Intelligence. On the day following, the People met together in the Oratory, a Place of Publique Worſhip, and Large enough to hold a Vaſt Number of Perſons; and thither came Jonathan nathan among the reſt. It was a Thouſand Pities, he ſaid, that This City had no better Governours: And there he Stopt; for he durſt not put them down-right upon a Rebellion at firſt Daſh: But Jeſus, the Head-Magiſtrate, came a little homer to the Point, and told them, without any more Ceremony, That it was Infinitely Better for them to have Four Rulers than One; Eſpecially if they were Men of Honourable Extraction, and Known Prudence, as Thoſe Perſons were; Pointing to Jonathan and his Companions that ſtood by. Juſtus was of the ſame Opinion too with Jeſus; and he brought over a great many more to be of the Same Mind: But the Common People were ſo Violently bent Another way, that without all Diſpute, it would have come to a Deſperate Tumult, if the Hour of the Day had not parted them; for it was now Twelve at Noon, which is the Sabbath day Hour for all our People to go to dinner: So the Deputies put-off the Debate till the Day following, without coming to any Preſent Iſſue. Upon the Firſt Notice of This Proceeding; which was as Early as Hands could bring it, I took up a Reſolution to be going the Next Morning by break of day toward Tiberias; and there did I find all the people gotten together in the Foreſaid Oratory, without ſo much as Underſtanding the True Reaſon or Intent of That Meeting. The Deputies did ſo little Expect to ſee me there at That time, that the Surprize put them to a ſtand what to do next, till at laſt, it came into their Heads to Raiſe a Sham-ſtory of a Body of Roman Horſe, that were ſeen near Homonœa ſome Thirty Stadia from the City. This Rumour was ſo Improv'd, even by the Inventors of it Themſelves, that the People were preſently in an uproar, Bawling and Clamouring what an Intolerable Scandal it was to have their Country Burnt and Deſtroy'd under their Noſes, and They to ſtand ſtill all the while looking on. Now the True Intent of This Stratagem was to draw Me out of the Town to Encounter the Enemy, and in the mean time get Poſſeſſion of it Themſelves by turning the Hearts of the Citizens againſt me. I ſaw well enough what it was they Aim'd at, and yet for fear of appearing leſs ſollicitous for the good of the Tiberians, than I ought to be, in caſe I ſhould have Declin'd the Undertaking, I found my ſelf under ſome kind of Neceſſity to Comply with the very deſign of my Enemies: So that I March'd away immediately to look after Theſe Troops according to the Intelligence. But diſcovering upon the Place, that there was No ſuch Body to be ſeen or heard of, I made all the haſte back again that was poſſible; and there did I find the Senate and the People Cloſe at it in Council; and the Deputies in the Middle of a Bitter, Tedious Invective againſt my ſelf; repreſenting me for a Man that minded his Pleaſure more than his Buſineſs, and taking No Care at all for the Defence of the Publique. Upon This Occaſion, they produced Four Letters, which they pretended to Receive from Four of the moſt Remote Parts of Gallilee; ſetting forth the Danger they were in, and the Neceſſity of a Preſent Succour. The Credulous Tiberians ſwallow'd the Whole Story for Current, and brake out Unanimouſly into Exclamations that it was High time now to look about them and to ſend a Seaſonable Relief to their Allies. Upon This Outcry, (underſtanding by This time the Myſtery of the Cheat) I told them that I was ready to make one which way ſoever the Neceſſity of the War ſhould call me, but in regard (ſaid I) that Your Advice comes from Four Several Places, and of Four Several Incurſions, I am of Opinion for Dividing your Army into ſo many Bodies; and the Four Deputies, to Command Every man his Party; for it is the Duty of Good Patriots and Valiant Men, to ſerve their Country with their Hands, and in their Perſons, as well as with their Conduct and Counſel; and it is not for Me to Undertake, upon This Diſtribution, the Command of any more than one Part of the Army. The People were all abundantly ſatisfy'd with the Reaſon of what I ſaid, and Order'd the Matter ſo, that the Deputies were forced to take their Parts in the Adventure; but mightily Enraged, over and above, to find all their Underhand, Perfidious Practices defeated and Countermin'd. One of the Four Pretended Deputies, whoſe Name was Ananias, (a man of a Falſe, Venomous Nature) propounded the Indicting of a Publique Faſt for the Next day, with a Command, that they ſhould all Meet at the Same Hour, and without Arms; Amplifying upon it, that they depended upon the Aſſiſtance of the Almighty without any need of Humane Force. Now the Intent of This Propoſal was under This Pretext of Piety, to Diſarm Me and my Soldiers. And I was fain to Comply again with This Propoſition, that I might not ſeem to Undervalue ſo Religious a Motion.

Immediately upon the Breaking up of the Aſſembly, Jonathan and his Colleagues wrote in all haſt to John, to be ſure to be Early with him Next Morning, with all the Force he could make; for if they could but get me into their hands once, the Buſineſs were done The Letter came Safe, and John made No Difficulty at all of Complying with his Orders. On the day following, I call'd out Two of the Braveſt Truſtieſt Fellows I had in the Guards; Accountr'd my ſelf with a Croſlet and a Good Sword, as as ſecretly as I could, and bad the Soldiers take each of them a Short Sword, privately too, and follow me. This I did that we might be in Condition to defend our ſelves, in caſe of any Affront. And ſo to the Oratory we went together, where I my ſelf, and my Friends were Admitted; but Jeſus having the Guard at the door would not Suffer ſo much as any one of the reſt of my People to Enter with me. As we were juſt upon the Point of Addreſſing our ſelves to our Devotions, after our manner of Worſhip; Jeſus ſtood up, and ask'd me what was become of the Rich Furniture, and the Maſs of Silver, that was Taken away upon the Firing of the Royal Palace? Where it was to be found: And who had it in Poſſeſſion? Now theſe were only Words thrown out to While away Time, till John might come up with his Army: But I told him in ſhort, that it was all Depoſited in the hands of Capella, and Ten of the Prime Citizens of Tiberias: So that it was but Asking Them whether I ſpeak Truth or not. Whereupon, Capella and the reſt, Own'd the having of it all in their Cuſtody. They put it to me then, what I had done with the Twenty Pieces of Gold that I receiv'd for the like Value in Silver that I Diſpos'd of? My Anſwer was, That I had given them to my Envoys that I had ſent to Jeruſalem, for the Charge of their Journy. Jonathan and his Companions reply'd, that it was very Ill done, to pay my Particular Agents out of the Publique Treaſure. This Malicious Humour of Wrangling and Cavilling, tranſported the Common People into ſuch an Impatience, that it fell little ſhort of a Violent Sedition; and finding how it Wrought, I could not do better, I thought, than to help it forward. And ſo I went on telling him that if in truth it was Ill done, (as he ſaid it was) to Gratifie my Meſſengers out of the Publique Stock, I bad him never trouble his head any further about That Money, for I would ſee it Repay'd. The Fairer Matters appear'd on My ſide, the more Out-rageous was the Multitude upon it, when they found the Whole Story from End to End, to have Nothing more in it than Spite and Calumny. This fell out ſo Contrary to Expectation, that Jeſus Order'd the Clearing of the Place of all but the Senators; for the buſineſs they were about was not to be done, he ſaid, in ſuch a Hurry and Confuſion: The People crying out on the Other Side, that they were reſolv'd whatever came of it not to leave Joſeph alone with them. While they were in the Heat of This Clamour, In came a Meſſenger, and Whiſper'd Jonathan in the Ear, that John would be with him immediately with his Party: So that Jonathan, upon This Encouragement, breaking out into a moſt Providential Impatience, (for I had certainly been loſt elſe,) Good Men of Tiberias, ſays he, do not Imagine that I would have Joſeph Puniſh'd for the Buſineſs of the Gold, but for Oppreſſing, and Impoſing upon the ſilly Multitude in the Tyrannical Affectation, and Exerciſe of an Arbitrary Power. At That Word, Certain Bravo's that were of the Plot ſet upon me, and had Undoubtedly Deſtroy'd me, if my Friends there upon the Place had not immediately drawn and kept them off. The Common People at the ſame time alſo threatning Jonathan to Stone him: So that betwixt them Both I was Reſcu'd for That Bout out of the hands of my Enemies. Upon my Withdrawing to make my Eſcape, whom ſhould I meet upon the way but John with his Troops upon their March to the Aſſiſtance of Jonathan. The Surprize Startled me, but I made a Shift however to give them the Slip, by a By-way, and get to the Lake, where I preſently took Boat, and away to Taricheæ: a Deliverance beyond all Expectation.

The First thing I did after my Arrival, was, to call a Council of the Chief Men of the Province, and give them the Hiſtory of the Barbarous Treatment I had receiv'd from Jonathan, and the Tiberians, contrary to Common Faith, Humanity, and Juſtice. This put the Whole Multitude of the Gallilæans into ſuch a Fury, that Nothing would ſerve them, but immediately to Declare War againſt John, Jonathan, and Their Companions, and Utterly to Confound them: which they Themſelves, they ſaid, would Undertake for, if they might but have Leave to Enter upon the Work. I did what I could, by Fair means, towards the Compoſing of This Impetuous Humour; adviſing them for the Preſent, rather to reſpite the Matter a while, till we might ſee what our Deputies had done at Jeruſalem; for there was No Reſolution to be taken without Their Approbation. With Theſe words they were Pacify'd; and John, after Another Baffle, went his way back again to Giſchala.

Some Few days after This, our Deputies brought us This Account from Jeruſalem, that the Government there was Highly Offended with Ananus, and Simon the Son of Gamaliel, for preſuming without any Publique Authority, to ſend their Agents to Remove Me from my Government of Gallilee; and that the Commons were ſo Incens'd at This Proceeding, that they had much ado to keep them from ſetting Fire to their Houſes. They brought Letters alſo, by which the Head Men of Jeruſalem, with the Authority and Conſent of the People, Confirm'd me in my Government, and Commanded John and his Aſſociates inſtantly upon the Notice of That

Order, to depart the Place. Upon the Receit of Theſe Letters, I went to Arbela, where I had appointed an Aſſembly of the Gallilæans; at which Meeting My Deputies made a Report of what paſs'd at Jeruſalem; how Heinouſly they Reſented the Inſolencies of Jonathan; and thereupon ſent me a Commiſſion, Ratify'd, for the Government of That Province; with a Command to Jonathan and His People immediately to quit their Pretences. This Order was ſent them accordingly, with an Expreſs Charge to the Bearer of it, to Obſerve their Countenances upon the Delivery of the Meſſage. The Surprize of This Letter put them to ſuch a Plunge, that they preſently call'd a Cabinet to Adviſe what was to be done: John Himſelf and the Chief Men of Tiberias and Gabara, being of the Council. The Tiberians were for their keeping the Power ſtill in their Own hands, and not to Abandon a People that had deliver'd themſelves up to their Protection: Eſpecially againſt an Enemy that threatn'd them with an Invaſion, as they falſely and maliciouſly pretended I had done. John was of the Same Opinion, with this Addition, that they ſhould ſend Two of their Deputies to Jeruſalem, with a Charge of Male-Adminiſtration againſt me: Which, betwixt the Credit of the Accuſers, and Variable Humour of the Men they had to do withal, could not fail, he ſaid, of making an Impreſſion upon the Common People. The Thing in fine was Agreed upon, and ſo they ſent Jonathan and Ananias ſoon after to Jeruſalem upon the Commiſſion, with a Guard of a Hundred Soldiers for their Safe Paſſage; the Other two Staying behind at Tiberias. The Tiberians fell to work immediately upon Repairing the Walls; betook themſelves to their Arms, and ſent for John's Troops, which were then at Giſchala in a Conſiderable Body, to be within diſtance of Aſſiſting them againſt me, if there ſhould be any Occaſion.

Joſeph's Out-guards Intercept Jonathan upon the way.

Jonathan, and his People being now upon their March, and Advanced as far as Darabitta, (a large Plain upon the Borders of Gallilee) fell about midnight into a Party of my Out-Guards, who took away their Arms, and kept them Priſoners upon the Place, according to my Order. Levi that Commanded the Party, gave me Notice of the Encounter, which for ſome Two days I made No Words of; but ſent Meſſengers to Tiberias, to Adviſe the People to lay down their Arms; who ſent me only Ribaldry and Foul Language back for Anſwer, in Confidence that Jonathan was by This time gotten to Jeruſalem. This Courſe Uſage did not at all Diſcourage Me from making a Further Attempt upon it, by Art and Stratagem: For I would not for the world have made my ſelf the Ring-leader of a Civil War. It came into my Head to try if I could Inveagle them out of the Town: And ſo I took to the Number of ſome 10000 Choice Men, and divided them into Three Bodies: Part of them I planted privately in Dora: A Thouſand of them in Another Village upon the Mountains, ſome Four Stadia from Tiberias, with Orders to be ready upon the Firſt Signal to make a Sally. Upon This, I ſhew'd my ſelf out of the Village within ſight of the Tiberians, who preſently made toward me with the moſt Scomms and Reproaches Imaginable. Nay, ſo Extravagant was their Inſolent Vanity, that they had provided a Mock-Funeral for me in Deriſion, and with a Phantaſtical Pomp of Solemnity, Expos'd my Body in the Field, with my mourners about me. But it was My Buſineſs to ſee, and ſay Nothing, and to leave them to the Fate of their Own Folly. I had a great mind all this while to get Simon and Joazar into my hands; and the Beſt way I could think of for the Gaining of my Point, was to try if I could Decoy Them and their Friends out of Town, with what Troops They Themſelves thought fit for their Own Security, under the Pretence of an Expedient I had thought of for the Adjuſting of all Differences, by Sharing the Adminiſtration among us. Joazar, that was Crafty and Suſpicious, kept himſelf at a diſtance for fear of a Trick; but Simon, being weak and covetous, ſwallow'd the Bate, and came over to me at firſt word with his Friends and his Guards about him. I receiv'd him with all Becoming Reſpects and Acknowledgements, for the Honour he had done me; and upon Walking and Diſcourſing together a Pretty while, I made it my Buſineſs to draw him off a little further from his Company, as if it had been only to be a little more Private, when all on a Sudden I took him up by the Middle, and ſending him away by ſafe hands, to the Next Village, I gave the ſignal at the ſame time for my Men to come out to me, and ſo March'd away with them directly for Tiberias. We had a very ſharp Encounter by the way, and the Enemy fought it ſo Hard, that I had the moſt to do in the World to make my People ſtand their Ground. But in the End however, with Extreme Difficulty and Hazard, we forc'd the Tiberians into the Town. I had now ſent Another Party by the way of the Lake, with Order to ſet the Firſt Houſe a-fire they could come at, which being done in This Nick of time, the Tiberians giving for granted that the City was Taken by Force, threw down their Arms, and with their Wives and Children caſt themſelves at my Feet for Mercy, as to a Conquer'd People. Upon this Submiſſion, I put a ſtop to the

On the day following, I Marched into Tiberias with Ten Thouſand Men; Call'd the Chief of the Town together into the Publick Place; Examin'd the Buſineſs of the Revolt; took the Ring-leaders into Cuſtody, and ſent them All Priſoners to Jotapata: Saving only Jonathan and his Companions, whom I ſet at Liberty, with a Convoy of 500 Soldiers to Conduct them to Jeruſalem, and an allowance for the Expence of the Journey. The People of Tiberias came to me now a Second time to beg my Pardon, with the moſt Solemn Aſſurances, that they would make amends by their Future Fidelity and Services, for what they had hitherto done Amiſs: deſiring me withal, that the Pillage, which the Soldiers had taken might be Reſtored to the Right Owners. Hereupon I gave Order for the Whole Booty to be forthwith brought in, and laid before me. The Soldiers, I perceiv'd, were not ſo forward in it as I could have Wiſh'd: Inſomuch that Obſerving One of them Finer than his Fellows, I put it to him how he came by That Habit? The Man could not deny it to be Part of the Plunder, and ſo I cauſed him to be Soundly Cudgel'd for Detaining it; with the Menace of a Greater Severity upon any Man that ſhould afterward preſume to With-hold any part of what he had Taken. Upon This, the Whole Booty was brought in, and Every Man as far as was Poſſible had his Own again.

I muſt not paſs over This Subject and Occaſion, without taking Notice of ſome Notorious Falſities, Impos'd upon the World, and Tranſmitted to Poſterity, by * Juſtus, and Certain Other Writers that have had the Handling of This Argument: Some out of Favour; Others out of Ill Will, Miſ-repreſenting the Truth of Things, and thereby turning Hiſtory into the Worſt of Forgeries, in regard both of the Quality, and the Impunity of the Crime. Now Juſtus taking upon him to Deliver an Hiſtorical Account of That War, hath laſh'd out into a great many Extravagant Falſities, not only to My Diſhonour, but he has not Spared his Own Countrey Neither; but Values himſelf upon Thoſe Inventions, as the Ornaments of his Story. So that I am now forced in my own Defence to lay him Open, by a Diſcovery of Certain Privacies to the World which I had hitherto Conceal'd. And let it not be Wonder'd at, after all, that I have put it off ſo long; for tho' I look upon Truth to be peculiarly the Province and the Duty of an Hiſtorian, there may be yet ſome Bitter Truths Themſelves, which a Grave and a Modeſt Author will make ſome difficulty to Mention, even in the Caſe of the Worſt of Men; not for Their Sakes, but for the Dignity of his Profeſſion and Office: But to come now to my Point. But, Juſtus, for Your Countrey, conſidering the Situation of " it; as it ſtands upon the Border of the * Lake of Genezareth, ſome Thirty Stadia " from Hippos; Sixty from Gadara, and a Hundred and Twenty from Scythopolis: " Places under the Kings Allegeance, and none of the Jews Garriſons thereabouts; " (Over and above that they wanted neither Men nor Arms): What ſhould hinder " You now with all Theſe advantages on your Side, from Diſcharging your Duty to " the Romans, if you had a mind to't? Or Suppoſing the Matter to be as You ſay, and " that in truth I was at That time in ſome Meaſure the Cauſe of the War; Who was " to Blame afterward, I beſeech you? Now if it be True, as You Suggeſt, that the War " was altogether againſt Your Will; and that You were driven upon it by Force, " how came it to paſs, that you did not lay down your Arms; and Caſt your ſelf at " the feet of Your Prince, and of the Romans, when That pretended Neceſſity was " over? For you were now out of danger of any hurt that I could do you. But " you were ſtill upon the Humour of Standing it out, till Veſpaſian was Advanc'd with " his Army up to your very Walls: And it was Then High time for you to call for " Quarter; when you found your ſelf certainly Ruin'd without it. And That Sub- " miſſion would not have Serv'd your Turn neither, without the Interceſſion of the " King to Veſpaſian, on Your behalf; for the City had been Raz'd to the very Ground " if he had not Obtain'd the Emperour's Pardon for Your Madneſs and Folly: So " that Your Enmity to the Romans was purely out of the Malice of your Own Heart, " without any Fault of mine. How many times have I Protected you, and had you at " Mercy, without Spilling ſo much as One Drop of Your Blood? Whereas it is No- " toriouſly known that in the rage of Your Inteſtine Broils; not in the Kings Cauſe, " nor in the Romans, but out of a Spirit of Animoſity, and Rancour one againſt Ano- " ther, You put to Death no leſs than a Hundred Eighty Five Citizens at a time, " when I was Blockt up in Jotapata. Well! And were there not Two Thouſand Ti- " berians Kill'd and Taken at Jeruſalem? Were you No Enemy, d'ye think, becauſe " you were at That time with the King? Not out of Love or Duty; but becauſe I " Frighted you thither. If you will needs have Me to be an Ill Man, pray what was " Juſtus then? A Wretch, that Veſpaſian Pronounced a Sentence of Death upon, tho' " the Execution of it was afterwards Remitted by King Agrippa; Twice a Priſoner; " as often an Exile; Once Redeem'd from the very Gibbet, upon the Mediation of " Berenice the Emperours Siſter; and finally, after all This, So Falſe to the truſt of a " Secretary, which he had the Honour to have Conferr'd upon him, that his Maſter " Baniſh'd him his Court, and his Preſence for ever. But Juſtus, without Raking any " further into your Miſdemeanours, I cannot Sufficiently Admire the Impudence of " Your Setting up for the moſt Perfect and Exact Hiſtorian of This War, to the Diſ- " paragement of all Others; when Effectually, You are but a Meer Stranger to the " Whole Matter, even to what has paſs'd in Gallilee it ſelf; for in the time of That " Action, You were with the King at Berytus: And ſo for the Siege of Jotapata, how " was it poſſible for You to make any Report of my Behaviour in That Adventure, " when there was not One Man left Alive but my Self to tell you the Story. Or you " will ſay perhaps, that the Relation you have given of what paſs'd at Jeruſalem, " may be more Correct. But it is a Thing hardly to be Imagin'd, that You, who " were Neither Perſonally in the Action, Nor ever ſo much as read Veſpaſian's Commen- " taries upon That part of the War, ſhould be ſo well Informed in the Story. UPon the Peruſal of Your Writings, I perceive you have little Need of any thing further that I can tell you; only when we Meet next, I may perhaps ſuggeſt ſome Certain Paſſages to your Conſideration that have ſcap'd your Knowledge.

Agrippa to Joſeph.

This was the Teſtimony that King Agrippa gave to the Truth of My Hiſtory; Not out of Flattery, for That was Below him; Nor in a way of Mockery or Merriment, for he was a Man of too much Honour, and Good Faith, to be Guilty of ſo Ill-Natur'd a Levity; but purely out of a deſire to recommend the Candour and Authority of my Writings to Poſterity, upon the Credit of ſo Authentick a Certificate

This is all I have to ſay to Juſtus, and it is no more than what I found Abſolutely Neceſſary in my Own Defence: So that I ſhall now return to my Text again. Where I brake off.

After the Quieting of Tiberias, I call'd a Council of my Friends, to Adviſe with upon the Buſineſs of John, and what Courſe to be Taken with him. They were All of Opinion for drawing the Whole Strength of Gallilee into a Body, and falling upon him, as the Principal Head and Author of the Whole Broil and Confuſion. But My Judgment was Utterly againſt the Taking of ſo Barbarous a Revenge; and rather to make Tryal of ſome Other way for Compoſing the Tumult without Blood. Upon Bethinking my ſelf, This Expedient came into my Head. I gave Order for an Exact Liſt to be procur'd of the Whole Faction; and having gotten the Names of the moſt Conſiderable Men of John's Party, I Publiſh'd an Act of Amneſty to All that ſhould come in within Twenty days, and laying down their Arms, return to their Duty: With an Aſſurance of Indemnity for what was paſt, upon their Complyance with This Edict; but for Thoſe that ſhould ſtand out beyond That time, they were to Expect All the Extremities of Fire, Sword, and Pillage. This was an Invitation as well as a Menace, and wrought ſo Effectually upon John's Followers, as well by Fear, as Otherwiſe, that Four Thouſand of them threw down their Arms immediately, and came over to Me: only his Fellow Citizens of Giſchala ſtay'd behind, and Fifteen Hundred Mercenaries of Tyre. This way of Proceeding kept John under ſuch an Awe, that he durſt not ſhew his Head after it out of his own Countrey.

4000 of Johns Followers brought over by an Amneſty.

Sepphoris was a Well Wall'd Town, and the Inhabitants a Sturdy ſort of People: So that betwixt their Confidence in the Strength of the Place, and the thought of my having my hands full elſewhere, they laid hold of This Opportunity, to betake themſelves to their Arms, ſending to Ceſtius Gallus, who was then Governour of Syria, either to come preſently, and take Poſſeſſion of the City Himſelf; or to put in a Garriſon Sufficient to Protect Them. Gallus ſent them word back again, that he would come, but Not When. Upon the Intelligence of what had paſs'd betwixt them, I March'd directly up to the Place, and Attack'd, and Carry'd it. The Gallilæans were willing to Improve This Advantage, and reckoning upon it that the Time was now come for the taking of a Thorough Revenge upon the Sepphorites, whom they Mortally Hated, they took up an Out-rageous Reſolution of Deſtroying, both Men, and City, in One Common Ruine. The People had Quitted their Habitations, and withdrawn withdrawn into the Caſtle for Protection, while the Soldiers put fire to the Empty Houſes, Pillaging and Rifling whatever they could lay hand on, without any Diſtinction, whether Friends, Kindred, or Strangers. It Wounded me to the Heart to ſee Theſe Barbarous Violences; Inſomuch that I call'd out to the Soldiers to give over for Shame, That Inhuman Unnatural Way of Proceeding againſt Men of their Own Tribe and Profeſſion. At This rate, I went on doing all I could, both by Entreaty, and by Authority, to Reclaim them; but when I found their Fury ſo Implacable, that neither the One, nor the Other would Work upon them, I betook my ſelf to This Stratagem. I gave it in charge to ſome of my Particular Friends, to get a Report put about, as if the Romans had Enter'd the Town on the Other ſide with a Mighty Army; for I Phancy'd to my ſelf that ſuch a Rumour might turn the Thoughts of the Gallilæans Another way; and ſo Preſerve the City. This Invention ſucceeded to my Wiſh; for the Alarum of an Aſſault Frighted the Gallilæans preſently from their Plunder, to Shift for Themſelves; and their Apprehenſion was ſo much the Greater, when they ſaw that I my Self ran away too for Company.

Joſeph Diverts them by a Stratagem.

Tiberias ſcapes as Narrowly as Sepphoris.

By This means Sepphoris was deliver'd beyond All Expectation; and Tiberias, afterward, ſcap'd every jot as Narrowly as the Other. Some of the Chief Senators, and Citizens of the Place apply'd themſelves by Letter to the King, that he would do them the Honour to come thither in Perſon; and take Them and the City into his Royal Protection: who ſent them Word in Writing, that he would be with them out of hand, and ſo Diſpatch'd away one Criſpus, a Jew by Extraction, and a Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, with his Anſwer. The Gallilæans had the hap to meet Criſpus upon the way, and knowing the Perſon of the Man, took him into Cuſtody, and brought him over to Me to be Examin'd. So ſoon as ever they came to Underſtand the Contents of his Letters, and the Buſineſs he was going about, the Whole Multitude immediately betook themſelves to their Arms. I was at That time at Aſoch, where I was Importun'd next Morning by a Prodigious Rabble of People gather'd together from all Quarters, with Clamours and Out-cries, that the Tiberians were all Traytors, and of the King's Faction. They were, in ſhort, ſo Furious, that Nothing leſs than the Demoliſhing of the City and my giving way to't, would Quiet them. The Tiberians, they ſaid, were as Bad, if not Worſe than the very Sepphorites. The Madneſs of the People I found was Implacable; and as there was No Good to be done upon them by Reaſon, ſo they were too many to be dealt withal by Force. As for the Letters, and the Subject Matter of them, there was no Denying, or Palliating of any thing; for the King's Anſwer Clear'd all. After I had been a good while turning my Thoughts from One thing to Another, and Contriving which way the People might be Fairly brought to their Wits again, and the Place Preſerv'd; it came into my Head at laſt, to take a Middle Courſe betwixt Oppoſing and Complying with them; and ſo I Reaſon'd the Caſe with them after This Manner. The Tiberians, ſaid I, are Mightily to Blame, and you ſhall have My Conſent with all my heart to make them Smart for't, provided you do Nothing hand over head; for upon a further Scrutiny you will find a Faction among the Noble Gallilæans as deep in This Plot upon your Liberties, as the Tiberians Themſelves. And therefore I am clearly for a little Patience, till you can get a Thorough Diſcovery of your Enemies; and then when You have them all in the Toil together, you may deal with them according to their Deſerts. The Multitude was ſo well ſatisfy'd with the Fairneſs of the Propoſal, that they Diſpers'd upon it, without any more Noiſe, and went their way in Peace.

The King's Meſſenger being all this While in Priſon, I made a Pretence, ſome few days after, of a little Buſineſs that call'd me out of Town; and in the Mean while, I ſent privately for Criſpus, and put it in his Head to Fuddle his Keeper, and to try if he could give him the Slip, and make his Eſcape away to the King. This was the Second time that Tiberias was Sav'd from Utter Ruine by My Means.

While Matters were in This State, Juſtus, the Son of Piſtus ſtole away to the King. I knew Nothing of his Going; and the True Reaſon of it was This. Upon the Breaking out of the Jewiſh War, the Tiberians had Reſolved with themſelves to ſtand Firm to the King and the Romans. Juſtus, on the Other hand, Debauch'd them into a Revolt, in the Hope and Proſpect of Playing his Own Game in the Hurry of Thoſe Confuſions, and making himſelf Maſter of the Government: But the Project did not Work His way; for the Gallilæans had Contracted ſuch an Averſion to the Tiberians for the Affronts they had put upon them before the War, that they would never ſuffer Juſtus to Eſtabliſh himſelf in his Pretenſions: and truly I my ſelf, when the People of Jeruſalem had put me into the Government of Gallilee, was many times provok'd to ſuch a Degree by the Wicked Practices of ThisLewd Man, that I had very much ado to forbear putting him to Extremities. Juſtus was ſo well aware of the Danger he was in, that for fear of the Worſt, and not knowing how far Paſſion and Affronts might might Tranſport a Man under My Circumſtances, he thought it his Beſt, and Safeſt Courſe to Withdraw, and betake himſelf to the King.

The Late Deliverance of the Sepphorites was little leſs than Miraculous; and yet the Danger was no ſooner over, but they ſent once again to Ceſtius Gallus, either to come away immediately Himſelf, and take Poſſeſſion of the Town, or elſe to furniſh them with a Force Sufficient to Secure it againſt the In-roads of the Enemy. Upon their Importunities, Gallus Order'd them a Conſiderable Body of Horſe and Foot, which they received into the City by Night. The Roman Horſe made ſuch Havock up and down every where, that I was fain to draw my Men to a Rendezvous near * Garizim, and there I Encamped, a matter of Twenty Furlongs, from Sepphoris. In the Dead of the Night I gave an Aſſault to the Walls of the Town, which my Men Mounted, and took Poſſeſſion of them: So that we were for a while Maſters of a Good Part of the City; but for want of Knowing the Streets and Paſſages, we were forc'd to Quit what we had gotten, without purſuing the Advantage any further, than the Killing of 12 of the Roman Foot; Two of their Horſe, and ſome few of the Sepphorites, with the Loſs only of One Man on our ſide. Soon after This, we had a Sharp Encounter with the Roman Horſe, and Fought it very Bravely for a Long time, till coming in the End to be Over-born with Numbers, and Surrounded by the Enemy, and my Self in the Middle of them, my Men were forced to give way in the Hurry of That Confuſion. In this Action I loſt Juſtus, One of my Guards, and formerly One of the Kings.

The Sepphorites ſend a Second Invitation to Ceſtius Gallus, Who puts a Body of Horſe and Foot into the Town by Night.

There came at the Same time a Body of the Kings Horſe and Foot, under the Command of Silas, the Captain of his Guards, who Encamped within a Matter of Five Furlongs of Julias, having Poſted Strong Parties at all the Avenues that lead to Cana, and the Caſtle of Gamala, to Cut off all Relief. Upon This, I ſent out Jeremiah in the Head of 2000 Men to the Bank of the River Jordan about a Furlong from Julias, where there paſs'd only ſome Slight Skirmiſhes, till I Joyn'd them with 3000 more my ſelf. On the day following, after Planting a Strong Ambuſh in a Bottom, at a Convenient diſtance from the Enemy, I Proffer'd the Kings Troops Battle, with Orders to my Men to turn their Backs upon the Firſt Charge, and ſo to fly before the Enemy till they had drawn them within reach of the Ambuſcade. This was done accordingly; and Silas taking it for a Rout in Earneſt, follow'd us ſo far that the Ambuſh fell upon his Rear, and put the King's Troops in ſo great a Diſorder, that upon My Facing about, and Charging them in the Front, they were ſo Abſolutely Broken; that if it had not been for One Spiteful unlucky Accident, it had been the Cleareſt Victory under the Sun; but my Horſe coming over with me in a Bogg, the Fall put my Wriſt out of Joynt: So that I was forc'd to be carry'd off to Cepharnome, a Village near at hand there, for Relief. Upon This Diſaſter my People fearing the Matter might be Worſe with me than in truth it was, gave over the Purſuit, and Apply'd Themſelves wholly to provide Surgeons and Phyſicians for me. After One day's Stay there, and falling into a Fever too, I was Removed That Night by the Doctor's Advice to Taricheæ. Upon the Intelligence of This Miſ-fortune, Silas and the King's Friends took heart again, and hearing that our Out-Guards were Looſe and Careleſs, they ſent away a Troop of Horſe privately beyond Jordan to lie in Wait there for the Opportunity of a Surprize, Daring us out Early the Next Morning to come to a Battle. My People Accepted the Challenge; but upon drawing out to Fight them, they fell into This Ambuſh of the Enemies Horſe, by whom they were Charged, Routed, and put to Flight with the Loſs only of ſix of our Men, who upon Information of ſome Troops we had that were paſſing by the way of the Lake from Taricheæ to Julias, went preſently off again without daring to purſue the Victory any further.

Veſpaſian came a while after This to Tyre, with King Agrippa in his Company; where he was Entertain'd with the moſt Virulent Outcrys and Exclamations of the People againſt their King that could be Imagin'd. He was an Enemy and a Traytor, they ſaid, both to the Tyrians and the Romans, and that it was by his Treacherous Order and Command that his General Philip deliver'd up both the Royal Palace at Jeruſalem, and the Roman Garriſon there. Veſpaſian gave the Tyrians a ſevere Check for the Saucineſs of ſo Audacious a Calumny upon a Crowned Head, and a Friend to the Romans; but adviſed Agrippa however, for Quietneſs ſake, to ſend Philip to Rome to Clear himſelf to the Emperour, and he went Accordingly upon that Deſign; but finding Nero in a Miſerable Diſtreſs by Reaſon of his Civil Wars, he went his way back again to Agrippa without ſeeing the Face of the Emperour.

Veſpaſian comes to Tyre with Agrippa. The People Charge Agrippa with Treachery in Philip's giving up the Royal Palace at Jeruſalem, and the Roman Garriſon there. Veſpaſian Chides them for their Inſolence, and Adviſes Agrippa to ſend Philip to the Emperour to Clear himſelf.

Not long after This; Upon Veſpaſian's coming to Ptolemais, the Governours of Decapolis came thronging to him with Grievous Complaints againſt uſtus for Burning their Country; who deliver'd him up to Agrippa to have him ſeverely Puniſhed for the injuries done his Subjects. The King upon this made him a Priſoner, without ever Conſulting the Emperour in the Matter, as is ſaid heretofore.

Complaints are brought to Veſpaſian at Ptolema's againſt Juſtus. Juſtus deliver'd up to Agrippa.

She and I did not live long together; but upon my being ſet at Liberty, and Entering my ſelf in the Train of Veſpaſian, who was then going to Alexandria, ſhe left me, and went her way. I marry'd Another Wife after This at Alexandria, from whence I was ſent with Titus to Jeruſalem, where my Life was ſeveral ways, and upon ſeveral Occaſions in Danger; the Jews lying in Waite to Deſtroy me on the One hand, and the Romans on the Other: For when any thing went amiſs with them, all Miſcarriages were ſtill lay'd at my door, and the Emperour could never be Quiet for the Clamours of the People to have the Traytor (meaning my ſelf) taken out of the way. But Titus (who was now Declared Emperour) was too well read in the Humours of Men, and in the Chances of War, to give any heed to the Clamorous Importunities of an Impetuous Multitude: Inſomuch that after the very Sacking of the City, he was ſo Generous, as many and many a time to Offer me my Choice of whatever I had a mind to out of the General Ruins; and for a word ſpeaking, I ſhould have it. But alaſs! in the Calamity of That Inconſolable Loſs and Deſolation, I could find Nothing worth my Asking but the Liberty of my Country-men and Friends, and the Poſſeſſion of the Holy Bible in my Cuſtody, which was immediately granted me with all the Francknes Imaginable: My Brother; with a matter of Fifty of my Acquaintance being Pardon'd, and Diſcharg'd ſoon after at my Requeſt. With the Emperor's Leave, I went after This into the Temple, where I found ſhut up a Vaſt Multitude of Women and Children; and among the reſt, to the Number of about a Hundred and Ninety Perſons of my Familiars and Friends, who upon My Mediation were all abſolutely ſet Free, without ſo much as any ſort of Condition or Ranſom.

At my coming back, there were a Great many Priſoners Crucifyed upon the way, and among Others, Three Men with whom I had had a Friendſhip of a Long ſtanding. I was ſo Surprized with This Wounding Spectacle, that I went preſently with Tears in my Eyes to Titus, and told him the Story. He had no ſooner heard it, but at the ſame Inſtant he Order'd the Bodies to be Taken down, and all poſſible means uſed for their Recovery. The Emperour Veſpaſian did me the Honour alſo upon his Return to Rome, to take Me into the Same Veſſel with him, and upon his Arrival there, he was pleas'd to Treat me after the moſt Favourable and Gracious Manner that could be. In the Firſt place, he made me Free of the City and then Lodg'd me in the Palace, that He himſelf had liv'd in before he was Emperour. He ſettled upon me a Yearly Penſion, and kept up his Bounty and Goodneſs to me at the ſame rate, as long as he Liv'd, which drew upon me the Mortal Envy and Hatred of my Own Nation. And which is yet a more Honourable Mark of his singular Goodness toward me, he hath been pleased to grant me the Privilege of an Exemption from All Taxes and Duties for the Estate that I am possess'd of in Judæa. Joſeph Dedicates his Antiquities to Epaphroditus.

Flavius Josephus TO EPAPHRODITUS:

In Answer to Apion about the Antiquity of the Jews.

BOOK I.

I Have said enough already in my Jewish Antiquities (most Excellent Epaphroditus) to put it out of all Doubt, that the Jews are a very Ancient People; and a Nation Indebted only to Themselves for their Original; beside that They have kept up their Claim from the Beginning, to This very Day. This is no More than what I have made Undeniably Appear in a Just History of Five Thousand Years, drawn from the Authority of Holy Writ it self: and All This too little yet, either to secure the Author of That Piece from Calumny, and Reproach, or the Whole Story at Length, from the Vanity of a Fable. For, say they, if the Race of the Jews were so Illustrious as Josephus makes it, how comes it that None of the Greek Historians of the Best Credit, ever took any Notice of it? Now This being the Case, I cannot do my self a more Necessary Right, than in the First place, with all possible Brevity, to Confute and Correct my Malicious Enemies: Secondly, to Inform and Instruct the Ignorant: and Thirdly, to lay open Indifferently to all Lovers of Truth, the Naked State of the Matter. As for my Authorities, I shall make use of none but Men of an Undeniable Reputation among the Greek Writers: and for Those, that have either Spitefully, or Ignorantly traduced Me, or my Writings, I shall Overthrow their Pretensions out of their Own Mouths. I shall likewise shew how it comes to pass, that the Greeks, in General, have made so little Mention of us: and then for the rest, in Particular, that they either knew nothing at all in reality, or at least pretended to know nothing at all of the Matter in Question.

The Jewish Antiquities, a History of 5000 Years.

What mov'd Josephus to Write This History.

There are a sort of People so Superstitiously addicted to the Greeks, that they make them the only Oracles to be Consulted for the Faith and Credit of History, to the Contempt and Disparagement of all other Men and Nations. Now I cannot but infinitely Wonder at the Confidence of These Dablers in Antiquities in These Cases, where both Reason and Fact are directly against them. Wherefore we are not to govern our selves by This, or That Man's Opinion, but by the Weight and the Intrinsick value of the Thing it self. As for the Greeks, I see little or nothing among them that is not Novel, and of Yesterday, as we say; either in their Buildings, Arts, or Laws; and, in fine, the very Use of History is but of Late Date among them: Whereas by their own Confession, the Ægyptians, Chaldæans, and Phœnicians (to say nothing of our selves) have from time to time Recorded and Transmitted down to Posterity the Memorials of past Ages; in Monumental Pillars and Inscriptions, according to the Advice and Direction of the Wisest Men they had, for the Perpetual Memory of all Publick Transactions of Moment, and to the End that nothing might be Lost: beside that These People, living in a Clear Air, the very Climate Contributed to the preserving of These Antiquities from Corruption and Decay; which was quite Otherwise with the Greeks, in Both Respects, either of Duration, or of Order and Appointment.

The Græcians are altogether for Novelties.

The Ægyptians, &c. a People of Antiquity and Credit.

It is natural enough for Those that set up New States, or Societies, to fansie themselves the Greatest Masters of That Oeconomy under the Sun. Now as to the Greeks skill in Letters, they came not only Late to the bare Pretence, but they are not at This very Hour come up to the perfect Understanding of the Matter. The

Antiquity

Antiquity they boaſt of, looks no further backward than to the Phœnicians: and they value themſelves upon the Reputation of having had Cadmus for their Firſt Maſter: But ſo far are They from being able to produce, either in their Temples, or Publick Regiſtries, any One Authentick Memorial of Theſe Times; that when it came afterward to be a Queſtion, whether the Uſe of Theſe Letters was ſo much as known at the Time of the Trojan War, it was carry'd in the Negative, that there were no ſuch Characters then in Being. It is moſt Certain, that there is no Greek Manuſcript Extant that dates before the Poem of Homer: and it is likewiſe as Certain, that the Trojan War was over, before That Poem was Written. Nay, and it will not be allow'd neither that Homer ever Committed This Piece of his to Writing at all; but it paſs'd up and down like a kind of a Ballad-Song that the People had got by rote; till in the end Copies were taken of it from Dictates by Word of Mouth; which was the True Reaſon of ſo many Contradictions and Miſtakes in the Tranſcripts.

The Firſt Inventers of Letters.

No Greek Manuſcript before Homer.

As for Cadmus the Mileſian, Acuſilaus, and Other Greeks, that afterwards put in for Hiſtorians; Theſe were all but very little before the Perſians Inroad into Greece. And ſo for Pherecydes of Syros, Pythagoras, and Thales; who were the Firſt among them, that ever Philoſophiz'd upon Divine and Celeſtial Matters; they do All Unanimouſly own the Ægyptians and the Chaldæans for their Maſters; and for the Little that we find publiſh'd in Writing upon That Point, however it may have the Reputation of ſome Antiquity; yet whether Theſe Men were the Authors of it or Not, remains to This Day a Queſtion.

How Unreaſonable a Thing is it for the Greeks now, to appropriate to Themſelves, not only the Sole Knowledge of Antiquity, but a Preference likewiſe before all Others for Men of Hiſtorical Faith, Candor, and Credit! Nay, is it not Evident, on the Contrary, from their Own Works, that the Hiſtory They deliver is not ſo much Matter of Fact, as Conjecture and Opinion; and that Every Man Writes according to his Phancy? Their Authors ſtill Claſhing One with another, and impoſing upon the World inconſiſtent Reports, at the ſame time, of one and the ſame Thing.

It would be Tedious, and Time Loſt, to run thorough all the Diſagreements betwixt Hellanicus and Acuſilaus, in the matter of their Genealogies; the Differences betwixt Heſiod and Acuſilaus; or to ſhew how many times over and over Ephorus hath given the Lye to Hellanicus; Timæus to Ephorus; Thoſe that came after Timæus, to Timæus Himſelf; and, in fine, All, to Herodotus.

Neither does Timæus agree any better with Philiſtus, or Callias, in their Sicilian Hiſtories: neither do the Hiſtorians of Athens and Argos accord any better than the reſt, but fall foul one upon Another. Now, in One Word, what Hiſtorical Agreement are we to Expect from the Reporters of Private Actions and Adventures, when even in the Courſe and Narration of the Perſian War, the Moſt Celebrated Authors are at Variance among themſelves! Nay, the Truth and Credit of Thucydides Himſelf is call'd in Queſtion upon ſeveral Occaſions, though the Moſt Cautious, Candid, and Untainted Hiſtorian of the Age he wrote in.

Thucydides Himſelf Cenſur'd.

There may be many Reaſons given for This Claſhing among the Greek Authors, if a Man would but apply himſelf to the finding of them out. But the Two Points that I lay the Principal ſtreſs upon, are Theſe. Firſt, the Failing of the Greeks in not laying a Timely Foundation of Hiſtory in Records and Memorials, to Conſerve the Memory of all Great Actions: For without Theſe Monumental Traditions, Poſterity is left at liberty to Write at Random; and to Write Falſe too, without any Danger of being Contradicted in the Hiſtory of Former Times. Now This way of keeping Publick Regiſters hath been neglected, not only in Other Parts of Greece; but it was never heard of, even in Athens it ſelf, where the People paſs by the Name of Earth-born, with a Reſpect to their Original; and value themſelves above all Others, both for Antiquity, and Letters. Draco's Penal Laws are Univerſally allow'd an Antecedence to all Other of their Writings, though bearing Date but a little before the Tyrant Piſiſtratus. And what ſhall we ſay now to the Arcadians, that ſet up for a Priority of Pretenſion too, and yet came later to the Uſe of Letters than any of the reſt?

The Greeks Divided, and the Reaſons of it.

Now there being no Lights, or Authorities Extant, for a Guide to Thoſe that were deſirous to Learn, or to ſet others Right, that went either Innocently, or Maliciouſly, out of their way: How was it poſſible, but Hiſtorians muſt be divided and Confounded among Themſelves! Eſpecially when Truth is made the Leaſt Part of their Buſ'neſs; how fairly ſoever they may Profeſs and Pretend to the Contrary. They write, in Effect, for Popular Applauſe; and if they can but get the Reputation of Good Oratours, no matter for Diſcharging the Part of Honeſt Men. Some write meanly for Fancy, or Humour, without any Regard of Juſtice to the Story. Others, upon the Panegyrick, and currying Favour with Great Men; and there are

ſome again that ſpend their time in Caluminating the Writings and the Perſons of Thoſe that went before them; which is All Contrary to the Rule and Office of an Hiſtorian.

The Certain Marks of a True Hiſtory.

It is the Infallible Mark of a True and Genuine Hiſtory, when ſeveral Writers agree in the ſame Thing, Time and Place: But the Greeks, in Croſſing one another, made That Diverſity an Argument of Truth. If the Queſtion betwixt Them and Us, were Choice of Words or Delicacy of Style, we ſhould never diſpute the Precedence with them; but for Matter of Fact, and Antiquity it is quite Another Caſe.

The Gracians Betters Orators, than Hiſtorians.

The Antiquity and Uſe of Records.

The Regiſters under the Care of the Prieſts.

The Ægyptians and the Babylonians are known to have been very Diligent, and Exact of Old, in the Marking of their Accounts, and Annals. This way of Regiſtring among the Ægyptians, was the Prieſts Province; who took a great deal of Care and Pains, in the Diſcharge of That Duty. The Chaldæans did the ſame thing with the Babylonians; and the Phœnicians, intermingling with the Greeks, inſtructed Them alſo in the uſe of Letters for the Government of Life, and the Upholding of Publique Traditions. But This being Acknowledg'd on All hands, more Diſcourſe upon it in This place would be Needleſs. So that I ſhall only Content my ſelf to ſhew briefly, that Our Forefathers provided at leaſt as well for the Securing of This Order and Regulation, if not Better, than any that went before them; in Charging the High-Prieſts, and the Prophets with This Commiſſion: And we have kept up the Practice with Great Integrity, to This very Day: Nay if I might ſpeak a Bold word, I durſt almoſt Pronounce that it ſhall never fail. For there was not only Care taken from the Beginning, to make Choice of Men of Exemplary Piety and Virtue, for This Function; (over and above that they were ſet apart alſo for the Service of the Altar) but a Proviſion was likewiſe made for preſerving the Sacerdotal-Race Untainted with any Prophane or Adulterate Mixture; for No Man is Qualifi'd for the Office of a Prieſt whoſe Mother was not of a Prieſtly Extraction: And therefore without any Regard to Wealth, or Honour, whoever pretends to the Prieſthood muſt prove his Deſcent in a Right Line by a Multitude of Witneſſes.

Cuſtoms about Marriages, and Pedigrees.

And This holds not only in Judæa, but wherever our People are diſpers'd over the Face of the Whole Earth: As in Ægypt, and Babylon; and all over the World, in fine; where our Prieſts make it a Point of Conſcience only to Intermarry with their own Tribes. In This Caſe, they ſend from the Father to Jeruſalem, the Name of the Woman they have a mind to Marry; with a Draught of her Pedigree, well and ſufficiently atteſted. But in a Time of war, (which many times falls out) as for Inſtance in the Days of Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey the Great, and Quintilius Varus; and particularly within our Own Memory: In This Caſe the Surviving Prieſts Reform and Supply the Old Regiſters; compoſe New ones, and put the Women that are left, to the Scurtiny of a Strict Examination. The Prieſts Marry no Captives for fear of Contracting a Foreign Mixture: and there can be No Clearer Proof of their Integrity, than that the Names of all our Prieſts, in an Uninterrupted Succeſſion, from Father to Son, have now ſtood upon Record throughout a Tract of Two Thouſand Years. If any One Man among them Falſifies, or Prevaricates, he is preſently Forbidden the Holy Altar, and depoſed from the Exerciſe of his Function. In This Method, we are Certainly, and Neceſſarily in the Right. All Men are not allow'd to Write; and we meet with no Contradictions in Thoſe that do. As for Thoſe Unaccountable Antiquities among the Prophets, We look upon them as Divine Revelation rather than Hiſtory: But for Others that write the Story of their Own Times, the Number of them is not very Great, neither are they very Repugnant one to another. But to come to my Buſineſs.

22 Books of Holy Writ.

I reckon only upon Two and Twenty Books that we are bound to Believe; and Thoſe Two and Twenty Books compriſe the Hiſtory of the World from the Beginning of it to This Day. Five Books of Theſe Two and Twenty, treat of the Creation of the World and the Generation of Mankind; and ſo to the Death of Moſes in a Series of little leſs than Three Thouſand Years.

The Hiſtory of the Bible.

From the Death of Moſes to the Reign of Artaxerxes, the Son of Xerxes, and the King of Perſia, Every one of our Prophets wrote the Hiſtory of the Age he liv'd in, Comprehending the Whole in Thirteen Books: The Other Four Books Containing Holy Hymns and Moral Precepts. There is alſo a Courſe of Hiſtory from Artaxerxes to This Inſtant, which we look upon with Great Veneration; but incomparably ſhort of what we aſcribe to the Other, for want of the Succeſſional Line and Deſcent of the Prophets to make it ſtill more Authentique and Sacred. As for the Other works, We give as much Credit to them, as we would do to our Own Eyes: Having been Thus long in the World without any Attempt upon them, either to Add, or to Diminiſh: Nay, or but ſo much as to Transform, or to Diſguiſe them. But we ſet a Value upon Theſe Writings, as Divine; we call them ſo, and we are train'd up from the very Cradle Cradle to Meditate, to Obſerve, and to Maintain them as ſuch; and finally to ſuffer Death chearfully in their Defence rather than Forſake them.

The Bravery of the Jews above the Gracians.

How many are there of our Captive Countrymen at This Day, ſtruggling with all Manner of Deaths, and labouring under Exquiſite Torments, Contending in the Theatres with Beaſts and more Brutal Men! And What's their Crime, but that they will not Renounce their Countries Laws, and Blaſpheme the God of their Forefathers? When did ever any of the Greeks ſtand ſuch a Tryal of their Honour and Courage! A People that would not Venture that Shock to ſave all that can be Dear to them in the World! But alas! They look upon all that is Sacred of That kind, to be no more than Words of Courſe. And This is the Caſe even of the Beſt of their Hiſtorians. For they take upon them to write Hiſtory without any Privity many times to the Fact, or ſo much as either Conſulting, or Believing Thoſe that have been upon the Place, and Parties to the Action. What Extravagant Uncouth Hiſtories of our Late Wars have we ſeen Publiſh'd by Perſons that never came within diſtance of Underſtanding one Syllable of the Matter: But if they can Patch-up a Medley of Fancy and Hear-ſay, they have the Confidence to ſet-up preſently for Hiſtorians of the Firſt Rate.

Hiſtorians upon Gueſs, and Hear-ſay.

But This is not yet the Caſe of my Hiſtory; for I have deliver'd nothing but upon Ocular Teſtimony and Certain Knowledge: And having the Means of Informing my ſelf in Every Thing that paſs'd, I have been likewiſe as Faithful in the Report of Things, as I was Juſt and Accurate in the Scrutiny. I had a Command in Gallilee ſo long as our People were able to hold up their Heads againſt the Romans; but it was my Fortune in the End to be made a Priſoner, and Carry'd in Cuſtody to Veſpaſian, and Titus. Who Order'd me at firſt to be kept Bound; with a Commiſſion at the ſame time to Obſerve and to Inſpect what was done, but I was afterwards ſet at liberty, and went a-broad with Titus from Alexandria, upon Occaſion of the Siege of Jeruſalem.

Joſeph's Undeniable Authority for what He ſays.

There was Nothing at That time 'ſcap'd my Knowledge. The Motions of the Army were all Open to me; and no Care wanting on my Part, to repreſent Every thing to the Life: And ſo for the State of the City, I had it from Priſoners and Deſerters, with the Emperour's Expreſs Order to take them All into my Particular Care and Menage. I made the Beſt, in fine, of my Notes; and out of Thoſe Minutes, Compil'd my Hiſtory.

This Hiſtory was Compil'd at Rome.

The Foundation being now laid, and my ſelf at Rome, and at leiſure, I took ſome Friends to my Aſſiſtance in the Greek Tongue, and went on with my Work; wherein I have diſcharg'd my ſelf with That Scrupulous Nicety of Candour and Juſtice, that I dare ſay the Generals Themſelves, Veſpaſian and Titus, will Vouch for Me. Now Theſe were the Perſons to whom I made the Firſt Preſent of my Book; and Next after Them, to Certain Noble Romans that Commanded in the ſame War: Others I ſold to ſuch of our Own Party as I found well skill'd in the Greek Language: As Julius, Archilaus, the Incomparable Herod, and the Moſt Excellent King Agrippa; who do all acquit me with One Voice, that I have behav'd my ſelf like a Faithful Hiſtorian, and would Undoubtedly have expos'd the Abuſe, if I had either Left-out or Put-in any thing thorough Ignorance, or for Favour. And now ſome People treat Me as a cheat, as they would do a Boy at School, upon the Declamatory, betwixt Trifling and Detraction. But they never Conſider, that Whoever takes upon him to tell the Truth, he ſhould make ſure in the Firſt place, to know it Himſelf, and That muſt be done either by Himſelf or with the Help of Another; and I have already gone Both Thoſe Ways to Work.

He Appeals to the Generals Themſelves, and ſeveral Great Officers for the Truth of it.

Joſeph Treated as an Impoſtor.

He Reaſons the Caſe and Clears Himſelf.

As for my Antiquities, I have, in the Quality of a Prieſt, and in the Way of my Profeſſion, Extracted them out of the Holy Scripture, and Digeſted them into a Methodical Order. But in the Hiſtory of the War I was an Actor in ſome Caſes; a Spectator, in Others; and, upon the Whole Matter, a ſtranger to Nothing that was either Done or ſaid. How Shameleſs an Impudence is it now for Theſe People to Contend with me for the Truth? Nay, putting the Caſe as they pretend, and that they have indeed had the ſight of Titus's and Veſpaſian's Journals: What does This ſignifie to the Invalidating of My Hiſtory, in a Point where the Roman Generals were abſolute Strangers to the Matter.

This Digreſſion was but Neceſſary, to ſhew what a ſort of Hiſtorians we are like to have if This Liberty goes forward. But this is enough ſaid I think to ſatisfie any Man, that the very Barbarians Themſelves ſtand Fairer for the Dignity and Reputation of that Pretence than the Greeks.

The Greeks will have the Jews to be Upſtarts.

I come now to a ſort of People that will have the Jews to be Novel, and no Better than Upſtarts; becauſe the Greeks, they ſay, make no Mention of Us. I ſhall then Cite my Authorities out of our Own Books, and lay Open the Unreaſonable Malice of all our ſpiteful Adverſaries.

As

As to the Place of our Habitation, or Abode, we live in a Midland-Country; and for the Matter of Trade, and Ramble, we never trouble our Heads upon either of Thoſe Two Accounts. Our Cities lie Remote from the Sea; the ſoyle Fruitful, and Well-dreſs'd, and Cultivated. Our Greateſt Care is for the Maintenance and Education of our Children, and to have them train'd-up to Piety, and in Obedience to the Laws of our Country: And This is it we reckon upon as the Main Buſineſs of our Lives. After all This, we have a Peculiar way of living to Our ſelves, which gives us to Underſtand that in Times paſt we had no Communication with the Greeks; as the Ægyptians, and Phœnicians had: And ſo had Others alſo, by a Common Tye of Navigation, Trade, and Commerce, for the Advancing of their Fortunes. Neither did our Predeceſſors make Inroads upon their Neighbours, as Other People have done, for the Enlarging of their Eſtates; though they wanted neither Numbers, nor Courage, to be Dangerous and Troubleſome, if they would have been Croſs.

Thus it was that the Phœnicians became known to the Greeks; and by Them, the Ægyptians, and Other Traders into Greece. After Theſe, the Medes and Perſians; who having gotten into the Command of Aſia, the Perſians carry'd the War into Europe. The Thracians became known by Neighbourhood; the Scythians, by holding a Correſpondence with Thoſe that uſe the Pontus; and ſo all along the Eaſtern and the Weſtern Sea, the People could not fail of Hiſtorians. But for Thoſe that live far into the Continent, it was a kind of Terra Incognita to Them for many Ages: and the Same Thing in Europe too: When after an Eſtabliſhment of the Roman Power and Greatneſs, and ſo many Conqueſts and Triumphs without Controul; yet neither Herodotus, nor Thucydides, or any Other of their Cotemporaries, ever made ſo much as the Leaſt Mention of This Mighty Empire; till the Rumour of it came at length to the Greeks, and with very much ado.

A Notorious Blunder of a Famous Hiſtorian.

But what will become of Common Writers, when Ephorus Himſelf, the Flower of the Whole Choice; ſhall be Guilty of ſuch a Blunder: as This for Example, that I am about to tell you. He takes upon him to give an Account of the Gaules and Iberians, and makes the Kingdom of Spain it Self, with the vaſt Continent it ſtands upon, to be no more than One City; and ſo Impoſes upon us for the Hiſtory of the Place, Things that were never Done, Said or Heard of There. And whence comes This Ignorance of the Truth now, but from taking our Aim at it out of diſtance? Or Whence comes the Others Miſtake of the Truth, but from an Affectation of overdoing the Truth it ſelf?

And where's the Wonder Now, for People that live Strangers to the World, and in a Manner out of it; and under ſuch a Reſerve as we do, not to furniſh Matter for Hiſtory?

Joſeph turns the Greeks Reaſonings upon Themſelves.

But what if I ſhould turn the Greeks Way of Reaſoning upon Themſelves now, and Conclude againſt the Antiquity of Their Race, becauſe Our Books ſay nothing of it? Would not ſuch an Inference be Exploded as Ridiculous? And would not the Greeks appeal to the Neighbourhood to make out their Claim? Now if This be Fair on the One Side, Why may not I go the ſame way to Work on the Other? The Ægyptians, and the Phœnicians, are the Chief Witneſſes that I ſhall make Uſe of in This Caſe; and there will be no Ground neither of Exception to the Evidence: for the Ægyptians are Notoriouſly known to be Our Profeſs'd Enemies; and ſo are the Phœnicians, particularly Thoſe of Tyre. But the Chaldæans have a Better Opinion of us; as having been in Time paſt, under their Command; and likewiſe for Blood, as well as for Countrey-ſake, they make Honourable Mention of us in their Chronicles.

Joſeph Appeals to the Greek Hiſtorians Themſelves. The Teſtimony of Manethon, an Ægyptian Writer.

When I ſhall have clear'd my Countrey-men from This Calumny of the Greeks, and Diſcharg'd all the Abominable Slanders they have caſt upon us, it will be Then Time to ſee what the Greek Hiſtorians ſay of us Themſelves, without leaving Room for any Further Cavil. To begin now with the Ægyptians, (who are not look'd upon to be any Great Friends of ours) there is One Manetho, an Ægyptian by Birth, and well Skill'd in the Greek, as appears by a Greek Hiſtory he Extracted out of the Holy Scriptures about the Jewiſh Religion. This Manetho, falls foul upon Herodotus, in many Places, for belying the Ægyptians through the Ignorance of their Ways and Cuſtoms; and in the Second Book of his Hiſtory, he delivers Himſelf as follows. I make uſe of his very Words, as if his Perſon were here Preſent to make good his Teſtimony.

" We had a King Whoſe Name was Timæus; and in His Reign we fell, beyond all " Imagination, under God's Heavy Diſpleaſure. There came flowing in upon us a " Rugged Robuſt People out of the Eaſt, that made an In-road into the Province;
" and There Encamping, took it by Force, and carry'd all before them without ſo

" much

" much as a Stroke, putting Our Princes in Chains; cruelly laying our Cities in Aſhes;
" Demoliſhing our Temples, and Miſerably Oppreſſing our Inhabitants: Some Cut to " pieces; and Others, with their Wives and Children, ſent away into Bondage. Af" ter all This, they ſet up a King from among Themſelves, whoſe Name was " Salatis.

" This New King advanc'd to Memphis, and having Subjected both the Upper and " the Lower Provinces, and put Garriſons into all Tenable Places, he Fortify'd to the " Eaſtward in a more Eſpecial Manner, for fear of an Invaſion from the Aſſyrians, " whom he look'd upon as the Stronger of the Two. He found in the Countrey of " Saites, a City formerly call'd (a) Avaris, which was Situated very Conveniently for " His Purpoſe, to the Eaſt of the River (b) Bubaſtis. This City he Improv'd and
" Repair'd, and Fortify'd it with Strong Works and Walls, and a Body of Two Hun" dred and Forty Thouſand Men to Cover it. He made Choice of Harveſt-time for " the Execution of his Deſign, with a regard both to the Plenty of the Seaſon for " Proviſions, and to the Means alſo of Paying his Soldiers, and to the Securing of " Himſelf likewiſe againſt all Aſſaults, or Invaſions, by his Excellent Diſcipline and " Conduct.

Salatis breaks in upon, and over-rules the Ægyptians.

" Salatis Dy'd in the Nineteenth Year of his Reign, and one Bæon Succeeded him,
" Who Govern'd Forty Four Years. After Him came Apachnas, and Reigned Six and " Thirty Years and Seven Months. (c) Apochis came Next, and Ruled Sixty Years
" and One Month: Janias, Fifty Years and One Month; and Laſt of all came Aſſis, " Who Rul'd Forty Nine Years and Two Months. Theſe Six were the Firſt Kings, and " perpetually in War to Exterminate the Ægyptians, Root and Branch. The People " were called HYCSOS; That is to ſay, King-Shepherds: for HYC, in the Holy " Tongue, is as much as King; and SOS, according to the Vulgar, is a Shepherd: So " that HYCSOS is taken as a Compound. Some will have it that Theſe People were
" Arabians. According to Some Other Copies, HYC does not ſignify King-Shepherd;
" but Shepherd-Captive; for HYC and HAC, with an Aſpiration, ſounds in Ægyptian, as " much as Captive: And it ſeems to Me the more Reaſonable Interpretation of the " Two, as it Suits better with the Ancient Hiſtory.

The Succeſſors of Salatis.

A People call'd HYCSOS, or King Shepherds.

" We have it upon the Credit of the ſame Author, that when Theſe-----(call them what " you will) Kings, or Shepherds, and their Train had kept the Government of Ægypt
" in their Own Hands for the Space of Five Hundred and Eleven Years, the King of " Thebes, and the Remainder of Ægypt that was not as yet Subjected, made a Violent
" and an Obſtinate War upon the Shepherds, and Routed them, under the Command
" of King (d) Aliſfragmuthoſis: and when the Greateſt part of them were driven out
" of Ægypt; the reſt withdrew into a Place called Avaris, of Ten Thouſand Acres
" in Content: And This the Shepherds, (according to Manetho) encloſed with a " Strong Subſtantial Wall, that ſecur'd them All Neceſſaries within Themſelves. He
" ſays further, that (e) Themoſis the Son of Aliſfragmuthoſis, laid Siege to it with " Four Hundred and Eighty Thouſand Men: But when he found that the Place was " not to be carry'd by Aſſault, they came to Conditions, upon Articles to depart
" Ægypt, and a Safe Convoy to go whither they would. Upon Theſe Terms they " March'd out with their Goods and Families, to the Number of Two Hundred and " Forty Thouſand Souls, by the way of the Wilderneſs into Syria; and for fear of " the Aſſyrians who were Then Maſters of Aſia, they retir'd into a Countrey that is " now known by the Name of Judæa; where they Erected a City large enough to " Receive This Vaſt Multitude, and call'd it Jeruſalem.

The Building of Jeruſalem.

" The Same Manetho tells us in Another Book of his Ægyptian Hiſtory, that he " finds Theſe People in Books of Great Authority, diſtinguiſh'd by the Name of Cap-
" tive Shepherds; Our Anceſtors having been brought up to Grazing; and from That " Paſtoral Employment, taking the Name of Shepherds. They reckon that they had
" ſome Ground for calling them Captives too: For it was by That Name that our Fa" ther Joſeph made Himſelf Known to the King of Ægypt, When he Obtain'd Permiſ" ſion to ſend for his Brethren. But of This more particularly Elſewhere: So that it will be Sufficient at preſent to Conſult the Teſtimonies of the Ægyptians, upon This Subject, and to hear Manetho over again in his Own Words, about the Time when
This happen'd.

Why call'd Shepherds, and Captives?

Manethon Confirms the Teſtimony of Joſephus.

" King (f) Themoſis Reign'd Five and Twenty Years and Four Months from the " Departure of the Shepherds out of Ægypt, to the Building of Jeruſalem. His Son
" Chebron took the Kingdom after Him, and govern'd Thirteen Year; and after Him,
" Amenophis, Twenty Years and Seven Months; his Siſter Ameſſes, One and Twenty
" Year and Nine Months; her Son Mephres, Twelve, and Nine Months; his Son

Sethoſis makes his Brother Armais Lieutenant General; and Over-runs the Countrey.

" Lieutenant General of Ægypt, and Veſted him with all Sovereign Powers and Privi- " leges; the Wearing of the Crown Excepted; and with a Caution not to Oppreſs " the Queen or her Family, nor to inter-meddle with the King's Concubines.

" Sethoſis, upon This, March'd up to Cyprus and Phœnicia, and ſo forward to the " Medes and Aſſyrians; Conquering ſtill as he went: Some by the Sword; Others by " the very Terror and Reputation of his Arms. He was ſo Elevated by his Succeſſes, " that he ſtopt at Nothing; but laying all Waſt to the Eaſtward, he carry'd the " Whole Country before him. While This was a doing, his Brother Armais without " any Difficulty, or Scruple, brake Faith with his Brother in Ægypt, and did juſt the " Contrary to What he ſhould have done. He Expell'd the Queen; Abus'd the " King's Concubines; and at the Inſtance and Advice of his Falſe Friends, aſſum'd the " Crown, and took up Arms againſt his Brother. The Ægyptian High-Prieſt gave Se- " thoſis notice of all Theſe Indignities from Time to time: upon which Advice, the " King came immediately back again by the Way of Peluſium, and made good his Go- " vernment. From This Prince the Countrey took the Name of Ægypt; for Setho- " ſis was alſo call'd Ægyptus, and his Brother Armais Nam'd likewiſe Danaus.

Thus far goes Manetho. And from hence it plainly appears upon a Clear Computation, that Our Predeceſſors, Otherwiſe known by the Name of Shepherds, left Ægypt Three Hundred Ninety Three Years before ever Danaus went to Argos; tho' the Greeks Value themſelves mightily upon the Antiquity of That Prince. Wherefore Manethon clears Two Great Points.

Manetho advances Two Great Points for Us, out of the Ægyptian Writings: One, that Our Fore-fathers came over to the Ægyptians from Some Other Place; the Other, that they were gone again almoſt a Thouſand Years before the Siege of Troy. As for ſome Other Reports of Manetho, that he has Superadded, not out of the Ægyptian Memorials; but, by his Own Confeſſion, from Stories without Authors; I ſhall take my time to ſhew that Thoſe Phancies are nothing more than Fables, and Fictions without any Ground. But we ſhall ſee now What Account the Phœnicians have given the World of This Matter. There are among the Tyrians Publick Records of Great Antiquity; and they are ſo carefully preſerv'd too, that Nothing ſcapes the Regiſtry that is Worth the Remembring. They make Mention, among Several Other Conſiderable Paſſages concerning our ſelves, Solomon's Temple Built long before Carthage.

of King Solomon's Erecting a Temple at Jeruſalem, a Hundred Forty Three Years and Eight Months before their Predeceſſors built Carthage: Deſcribing alſo the very Model of the Temple.

The King of Tyre, and Solomon Dear Friends.

Hiram the King of Tyre, had ſo Great a Friendſhip and Eſteem for David, that he lov'd his Son Solomon the Better, even for the Father's ſake: and as an Inſtance of the Value he had for him, made him a Preſent of a Hundred and Twenty Talents of Gold, toward the Ornament of the Fabrick, and Furniſh'd him with the Choiceſt Wood from Mount Libanus, for the Roof and Wainſcot. Neither was Solomon wanting, on the Other hand, in a Magnificent Return: As, among other Acknowledgments, he made him a Preſent of Zabulon in Naphthali. But the Love of Wiſdom was the Chief Inducement to That Tenderneſs of Friendſhip betwixt them. They Exchang'd Problems and Difficult Caſes, one with Another, to be Unriddled: and Solomon was the better qualify'd of the Two for That Faculty. There are Extant among the Tyrians, to This very Day, Divers Copies of the Letters that paſs'd betwixt them: and for Confirmation of what I ſay, I ſhall appeal to Dius an Hiſtorian, among the Phœnicians of an Unqueſtionable Credit; and in his Own Words.

Hiram, the Son of Abibal, Succeeded his Father.

" (h) Hiram the Son of Abibal, Succeeded his Father in the Government. He re- " pair'd and improv'd Divers Cities in the Eaſtern Parts of his Dominion; Enlarged " Tyre; and by the Help of a Damme, joyn'd it to the Temple of the Olympian Jupiter, " Standing in an Iſland; and Beautify'd it with many Rich Donatives. After This, he " went up to Mount Libanus, to cut down Wood for Temples.

We have a Report that Solomon the King of Jeruſalem, and Hiram, Interchang'd Certain Riddles to be Unfolded, upon Condition, that he that fail'd of the Solution, ſhould incurr a Forfeiture: and that Hiram, finding the Queſtion too hard for him, paid the Penalty. But One Abdemonus, a Tyrian, after This, reſolved the ſaid Queſtion; and propos'd New ones for Solomon to interpret, upon the Penalty of paying ſo much to Hiram. This is the Subſtance of what Dius ſays upon This Subject.

I ſhall

I shall come now to Menander, the Ephesian; an Author that has made a Collection of Historical Memorials out of the Lives and Actions of Princes both Greek and Barbarian: which for the Better Authority of the Work, he hath Extracted from the Records of the several Places of which he Treats; and having pass'd thorough the Succession of the Tyrian Kings as far as Hiram. Thus he goes on. Menander an Ephesian.

"Upon the Death of Abibal, his Son Hiram came to the Crown, and liv'd to "enjoy it Thirty four Years. This Prince threw up a huge Mount that join'd Eury- "chorus to the City of Tyre, and dedicated a Golden Pillar to Jupiter, which was "there deposited in his Temple. He went after This, into a Forest, to a Mountain "call'd Libanus, where he cut down all the Cedar for Roofs for Temples; Rasing "the Old Buildings, and Advancing Others. One he dedicated to Hercules, Ano- "ther to Astartes; the Former in the Month Peritius, and the Other when he "march'd against the Tityans, for not paying their Taxes: But upon the Reducing of "them, he presently return'd.

"Hiram had at This time a Young Man, a Servant in his House, Whose Office it The Pedigree of "was to Expound Solomon's Riddles, and his Name was Abdemonus. From This Hiram. "King's time now to the Building of Carthage, the Computation lies Thus.

"Baleazar the Son of Hiram, Succeeded his Father, and dy'd in the Forty third "Year of his Age, and the Seventh of his Reign. The Next was Abdastartus, the "Son of Baleazar; who dy'd in the Twentieth of his Life, and the Ninth of his "Reign; This Prince was Murder'd by his Nurse's Four Sons; and the Eldest of "them govern'd Twelve Year in His place: And after him, came Astartus the Son of "(a) Delæastartus, who liv'd Sixty Six Years, and Reign'd Twelve. After Him "came his Brother (b) Aserymus, who liv'd Fifty Four Years and Reigned Nine, and "was Murder'd by his Brother Pheles; who took the Government upon him in the "Fiftieth Year of his Age: and after a Reign of Eight Months, was slain by One "(c) Ithobalus a Priest of the Goddess Astarta; who liv'd to the Age of Sixty "Eight Years, and Rul'd Thirty Two. His Son Badezor succeeded him, who liv'd "Forty Five Years, and Reign'd Six: and then his Son d) Matgenus liv'd Two and "Thirty Years and Reign'd Nine. The Next was Pygmalion, who liv'd Fifty Six "Years, and Govern'd Forty. It was in the Seventh Year of his Reign, that his Sister "Dido built Carthage in Africa. So that from the Time of Hiram to the Erecting of "Carthage, we account a Hundred Fifty Five Years and Eight Months. Now taking "for granted that the Temple of Jerusalem was built in the Twelfth of King Hiram, it "makes a Hundred Forty Three Years and Eight Months from the Raising of the Tem- "ple to the Building of Carthage.

Can any thing be Clearer now, or more Pertinent to Our Purpose than This Testimony of the Phœnicians? for Our Ancestors were undoubtedly come into Judæa before they built a Temple in it; and That Temple was not built neither, till they had made Themselves Masters of the Conntry by the Sword; as I have made appear abundantly out of Holy Writ in my History of the Jews.

We shall see now how far the Chaldæans agree with the rest, in the Justification of our History: and begin with Berosus, a Chaldæan by Extraction, and an Author of Emi nent Credit with all Lovers of Letters for the Learned Pieces of Astronomy, and the Chaldæan Philosophy, that he wrote in the Greek Tongue. The Chaldæan Writers Agree with the Rest. Berosus the Historian.

This Berosus, after the Manner of the most Ancient Historians treats of the Deluge, and the Destruction of Mankind, just as Moses reports it: and of the Ark also; and how the First Father of our Race was preserv'd in it a-float upon the Mountains of Armenia. He runs thorough the Genealogy likewise of the Sons of Noah: their Names, and their Ages, and so carries on the Train, from Noah Himself to Nabulassar, the King of the Babylonians and Chaldæans, with an Account of This King's Exploits. He tells how he sent his Son Nabuchodonosor with a Mighty Army into Ægypt and Judæa; where finding the People in Rebellion, he brake in upon them; and when he had Conquer'd them, and set fire to their Temple at Jerusalem, he went his way, and carry'd off our Whole Nation in Captivity to Babylon. After This Confusion, the City lay desolate for seventy Years, till the Days of Cyrus King of Persia. He says likewise that the Babylonians were in possession of Ægypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia; and the King much a Greater Prince than any of his Predecessors. But we must not forget Berosus in his Own Words. As for Example.

"Nabulassar the Father, says he, understanding that his Deputy in Ægypt, the "Cœle-Syria, and Phœnicia, was up in Arms; being old Himself, and past the Fati- "gues of War, he sent his Son Nebuchodonosor (in the Vigour of his Youth) at the "Head of a Strong Army to bring him to Reason. This Prince Encounter'd the Berosus's Account of Nabulassar, and Nabochodonosor.

" It happened at the ſame time that Nabulaſſar ſicken'd at Babylon and Dy'd, after Nabochodonoſor's Kindneſs to the Captive Jews. " a Reign of Nine and Twenty Years. It was not long before the Son had notice of " his Father's Death; whereupon he immediately ſettled his Affairs in Ægypt; and
" the reſt of the Provinces; and Committing the Captive Jews, Phœnicians, and Syri-

" a ſmall Retinue along with him, took his Journey for Babylon by the way of the " Deſert. Upon his Arrival, he found all things diſpos'd to his Wiſh: The Chal-
" dæans, and all the Great Men declaring themſelves for His Intereſt, and for the " Eſtabliſhing of him upon the Throne of his Father.

" In This Interim, while the Priſoners were upon the Way, he Order'd them the " moſt Commodious Lodgings of the City for their Quarters, and all Accommodations
" to be provided for them. The Spoils of the War were apply'd with Wonderful " Frankneſs, and Munificence, to the Enriching and Adorning of the Temples:
" As That of Bel, and others. He cauſed to be Erected a New Town for an Addition

" rious Palace near That of his Father's, but incomparably beyond it, both for the

This is what Beroſus ſpeaks of This King; and there are ſeveral other Things worth taking Notice of in his Chaldæan Antiquities, where he blames the Greeks for making Semiramis the Queen of Aſſyria to be the Foundreſs of Babylon. Now Beroſus is the more Credible in what he ſays, for coming up ſo near to the Phœnician Records about the King of Babylon, and his Subjecting all Syria and Phœnicia to his Command. Philoſtratus ſays Effectually the ſame thing in his Siege of Tyre; and Megaſthenes, in the Fourth Book of his Indian Hiſtory, where he makes This King of Babylon to have been a Greater and a Braver Hero, than Hercules Himſelf; adding withal, over and above, that he had the Greater part of Libya and Iberia at his Devotion.

Beroſus Concerning the Temple of Jeruſalem. As to what Concerns the Temple of Jeruſalem, we have the Authority of Beroſus for it, that it was laid in Aſhes by the Babylonians; and that Cyrus, who had at That time the Abſolute Dominion of Aſia, began afterwards to rebuild it: as the ſame Beroſus has it, in his Third Book, and in Theſe Words.

And the Story of Nabochodonoſor. " When Nabochodonoſor was juſt Enter'd upon the Third Wall, in the Forty Third " Year of his Reign, he fell ſick and dy'd. Evil-merodach his Son Succeeded him;
" but having made himſelf Odious to the higheſt degree by his Exorbitant Luſts,
" and Oppreſſions, he was cutt-off by the Treacherous Practice of Nirigliſſoror his
" Siſter's Husband, in the Second Year of his Reign. After His Death, the Traytor
" advanc'd himſelf to the Crown, and kept it Four Years. His Son Laboroſardochus
" came very Young to the Government, and continu'd in it only Nine Months; be" ing Then deſtroy'd by the Treachery, even of his very Friends, who look'd upon " him as a Youth of Vicious and very Dangerous Inclinations, and ſo took him out " of the way. He was no ſooner diſpatcht, but the Conſpirators met; and ſo laying " their Heads together, choſe one Nabonidus for their King, being both a Babyloni-
" an, and of the ſame Family. The Walls about the River of Babylon, were Finiſh'd
" by This Prince.

Cyrus over-runs all Aſia. " In the Seventeenth Year of This King's Reign, Cyrus, with a Mighty Army out
" of Perſia, over-ran all Aſia; and ſo March'd directly away for Babylon. Nabonidus
" fairly met him in the Field; fought him, and loſt the Battle: Only Himſelf, and " ſome few of his People got into the Town of Borſippe. Cyrus was now before Ba- " bylon; making no doubt, but upon forcing the Firſt Wall, he might Carry the " Place. But, upon Second Thoughts, he quitted the Siege, and went back to Bor-
" ſippe, with a Deſign to Attack the Place. But Nabonidus choſe rather to caſt him-
" ſelf upon Cyrus's Mercy, than to ſtand the Shock; and ſo upon his Humiliation, Cyrus
" baniſhd

" baniſh'd him out of Babylon, and put him in the Quiet Poſſeſſion of an Eſtate in " Caramania; where he ended his Days in the Condition of a Private-Man.

Theſe Words of Beroſus agree Exactly with our Books: That is to ſay; that Nebuchodonozor deſtroy'd our Temple in the Eighteenth Year of his Reign; and in That Condition it lay Deſolate for Seven Years. In the Second Year of King Cyrus, the Foundations of it were laid anew; and in the Second of Darius, the whole was Rebuilt. We ſhall now ſubjoin to the Foregoing Authorities, ſomewhat out of the Phœnician Hiſtories; for Proofs can never be too many Provided they Agree in Chronology; And the Computation ſtands Thus. Beroſus Agrees with Our Books. And ſo do the Phœnicians.

Nebuchodonozor laid a Siege of Thirteen Years to Tyre in the Reign of King Ithobal. Baal came after Him, and Reigned Ten Years: And Then they Erected Judges in the Place of Kings; as there was Ecnibalus the Son of Baſlech, that Govern'd two Months; Chelbis the Son of Abdæus, Ten Months; the High-Prieſt Abbar, Three Months; (a) Mytgonus, and (b) Geraſtus Batus the Sons of Abdelimus, Six Years; and Balatorus among the reſt, One Year: Upon whoſe Death they ſent for Merbalus from Babylon, who Reigned Four Years: And upon His Death, they took his Brother Irom, who govern'd Twenty Years: in whoſe time it was that Cyrus made himſelf Maſter of the Perſian Empire. Now all This put together, amounts to Fifty Four Years and Three Months. It was in the ſeventh Year of Nabuchodonoſor's Reign, that he began the Siege; and in the Fourteenth of King Irom, that Cyrus had the Empire: So that what the Chaldæans and the Tyrians deliver concerning our Temple, does but further Verify our Own Writings upon That Subject. Here is enough ſaid already to put the Queſtion of our Antiquity paſt any further Diſpute; unleſs Men will be Willfully Blind.

But having to do with a People that will have all the World to be Barbarians but Themſelves; and allow nothing for Authentick, but upon the Credit of their Own Authority; We have no Other way than to make uſe of our very Adverſaries, for Witneſſes on Our Behalf againſt Themſelves, and to appeal to Greek Authors in our Own Juſtification. The Jews Appeal to their very Enemys.

There was One Pythagoras, a Samian; an Eminent Philoſopher, and the moſt Celebrated Man of his time for Piety and Wiſdom. This Pythagoras was not only Well-ſeen in Our Laws, but in many Caſes a ſtrict Obſerver of them, as moſt Manifeſtly appears: Not from any thing that he ever wrote, but from what Others knew, and reported Concerning him. As Hermippus, for One; a very Exact, and Careful Hiſtorian. He tells a Story in the Firſt Book of his (c) Pythagoras, of one Calliphon of Croton, a Particular Confident of Pythagoras. This Calliphon dy'd, he ſays, and his Soul would never let Pythagoras reſt Night nor Day, for Precepts and Inſtructions. It gave him in Charge not to paſs forward at any time where his Aſs had ſtumbled: to Drink only Clear Fountain-Water, and to ſpeak Ill of no Man. And then he goes on, that This was in Imitation of the Jews, and the Thracians; with an Application to Himſelf. And it was Truly ſaid; for This Man Incorporated divers Cuſtoms of the Jews into his Philoſophy. Pythagoras. Hermippus. Calliphon.

Our People were likewiſe ſo well known in Places of Note in Times long ſince paſt, that ſeveral Cities do, to This Day, retain our Rites and Faſhions; and Others reckon them Worth the Imitation: as appears by Theophraſtus in his Book of Laws; where he ſpeaks of the Tyrian Laws againſt Swearing by any Strange God; Naming the Corban among the Prohibited Oaths; That is to ſay, in Hebrew, The Gift of God: and it is only to be found among the Jews. Theophraſtus.

Herodotus Halicarnaſſæus was no Stranger to our Nation Neither; for he makes ſome Mention of Us in his Second Book: Where ſpeaking of the People of Colchos, he has This Paſſage. " As to the Matter of Circumciſion, I find only the Colchians, the " Ægyptians and the Æthiopians to have us'd it of old: but the Phœnicians, and the " Syrians in Palæſtin, Own the Uſe of it from the Ægyptians. The Syrians, that " border upon the Rivers Thermodon and Parthenius, and their Neighbours the Ma- " cronians, are reputed to have taken it up of late from the Colchians. There are no " Other that are Circumcis'd: and they proceed after the Manner of the Ægyptians. " But for the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, I cannot ſay which had it of the Other. " Now This Author is poſitive that the Syrians of Palæſtin are Circumcis'd: Whereas " there are no People Circumcis'd in Palæſtin but the Jews. Now ſpeaking This up- " on Knowledge, it muſt Neceſſarily be intended of the Other. Herodotus Halicarnaſſæus

And then there's (d) Chærilus, an Ancient Poet, in an Account he gives of the ſeveral Nations that fought under Xerxes, the King of Perſia, againſt the Greeks he makes mention of Our People after all the Reſt, in Words to This Effect. Chærilus.

Theſe

Theſe People, with an Admirable Grace, brought up the Rear; their Language Tyrian was;
Themſelves Unknown; the Mountains their Abode, by Solymus; that Near a vaſt Lake ſtood.
Their Hair Cut-round; and their Heads cover'd ore with Head-Pieces of Tann'd Horſe-Hides they Wore.

From hence it is Evident, that ſpeaking of the Mountains of Solyma or Jeruſalem, and of a Huge Lake at hand there, it can be Underſtood of no Other than of the Jews that inhabit among Thoſe Mountains: and of the Lake, Aſphaltites, which is by much the Largeſt in all Syria. And ſo much for Chærilus. Neither were the Jews barely known to the Greeks, or only to the Common ſort of them; but likewiſe to their Wiſe-men and Philoſophers of the Firſt Rank; and That with Marks too of a ſingular Friendſhip and Eſteem.

Clearchus, a Diſciple of Ariſtoteles.

Clearchus, a Diſciple of Ariſtoteles, a Peripatetick, and one of the Greateſt Men of the Sect, perſonates his Maſter in the way of a Dialogue with Hyperochides, in his Firſt Book of Sleep, upon the Subject of a Jew of his Acquaintance.

" It would be Tedious, ſays he, to run thorough the whole Hiſtory of the People " of the Jews: and therefore I ſhall only give you a Taſt of This Particular Perſon's " Admirable Wiſdom. Hyperochides made Anſwer, that it would be the Greateſt Fa- " vour he could do them. Why then, ſays Ariſtotle, I ſhall begin according to the " Rules of Art and Method, with what Concerns his Original or Profeſſion. He was " a Jew of the Lower-Syria; of the Race of a ſort of Philoſophers that the Indians " call Calani; and the Syrians call them Jews, from the Country of Judæa, where " they live. Their Capital City has a hard Name, and they call it Jeruſalem. He " was a Perſon of Great Hoſpitality to Travellers and Strangers; and no leſs Conſi- " derable for his Diſcourſes and Good Manners. It was my Fortune to be in Aſia, " with ſome Diſciples of Mine; and This Heavenly Man gave us ſeveral Viſits there, " to the High Satisfaction, and Improvement, of Thoſe that Underſtood the Bleſ- " ſing of ſuch a Converſation. This is the Teſtimony of Clearchus, in favour of the " Jews, though but by way of Digreſſion.

This is the Character, according to Clearchus, that Ariſtotle gave This Jew: over and above his Wonderful Temperance and Moderation, in the Government of his Appetites and Paſſions. They that have a mind to know more of him may read it in the Original, without running out into Superfluities.

Hecatæus the Abderite.

Hecatæus the Abderite, a Great Man both for Learning and Bus'neſs, being train'd up with Alexander the Great, and living with Ptolemy King of Ægypt, the Son of Lagus, wrote an Entire Tract Expreſly upon the Subject of the Jews; from whence I ſhall briefly Extract ſome Paſſages that I find for my Purpoſe, and begin with the Timing of them.

He gives an Account of a Battle fought betwixt Ptolemy and Demetrius, near Gaza, Eleven Years after the Death of Alexander, and in the Hundred and Seventeenth Olympiad, according to Caſtor. " It was in This Olympiad, ſays he, that Ptolemy the " Son of Lagus defeated Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, otherwiſe called Poliorcetes, " in a Battle not far from Gaza. Now it is agreed at all hands, that Alexander dy'd in the Hundred and Fourteenth Olympiad, and it follows conſequently that the Jews were a Flouriſhing People in the Days of That Great Prince.

Hecatæus's Character of Hezekias, to the Honour of the Jews.

" Hecatæus ſays further, that after the Battle at Gaza, Ptolemy made himſelf Ma- " ſter of Syria, and all thereabouts; and that People were ſo Charm'd with Ptolemy's " Humanity, and Good Nature, that a great many follow'd him into Ægypt, for the " Affability of his Converſation. There was among the reſt, One Hezekias, a High- " Prieſt of the Jews, and a Perſon of the Firſt Quality among his Country-men: Six- " ty Six Years of Age; a Wiſe Man, and a Powerful Speaker; and One that Under- " ſtood the World, no Man Better. The ſame Author ſays likewiſe that the Number " of Prieſts that received Tenths, and liv'd all in Common, were a Matter of Fif- " teen Hundred or thereabouts.

" And afterwards ſpeaking again of the ſame Hezekias; we had ſeveral Meetings " and Conferences, ſays he, with This Great Man, and Others about him; con- " cerning our Differing Cuſtoms, Practices, and Opinions: inſomuch that he car- " ry'd us to his Habitation, and Inſtructed us in the Manner of his People's Govern- " ment, and Diſcipline, which he ſhew'd us in Writing.

Hecatæus proceeds next to the Zeal and Veneration we have for our Laws; even to the degree of Chuſing Death, Torments and all Extremities: nay, and ſuffering Chearfully too, rather than be Guilty of the Leaſt Violation. And then he goes on upon upon the Subject of our Patience under Ill Usage and Reproach. " What Indignities " have These People endur'd, says he, from their Neighbours! How have they been " persecuted by the Persian Kings, and their Officers, and yet stood Firm to the last " Extremity against all Tryals! As for Instance. The Temple of Bel was fall'n down " at Babylon; and Alexander, being at That time upon the Place, had a Mind to " repair it, and accordingly Order'd all the Soldiers to assist in Carrying Timber and " Materials towards the Advancing of the Work. The Jews were the only People " that refus'd, and were severely punish'd for their Disobedience: But when the King " saw nothing would work upon them, out of a Generous Tenderness, for so " Brave a Constancy, he Order'd them to be Discharg'd. Upon their Return, (says the " Author) into their Own Country they Demolish'd all the Temples and the Altars that " they found Erected to strange Gods: For which some of them were fin'd and " punish'd, and Others Pardon'd. This Historian enlarges then upon the Wonderfull steadyness of our Resolutions; the Vast Multitudes of our People; the Prodigious Numbers that were carry'd away Captives by the Persians into Babylon; and others again, after the Death of Alexander, transported into Ægypt and Phœnicia, upon Occasion of a Sedition in Syria. He speaks likewise of the Extent, the Beauty, and the Fruitfulness of our Country: (That is to say, of Judæa) which he Computes at near Three Millions of Acres, and a most Excellent soil. And as to the City of Jerusalem; the spaciousness of it; the People and the Temple, he speaks to This Effect.

" The Jews have in their Possession a great many Towns, Villages and Strong " Holds; but One City above all the rest for Largeness and Strength. It is accoun- " ted Fifty Stadia in Compass; a Hundred and Fifty Thousand Inhabitants, and the " Name of it Jerusalem. In the middle of This City stands an Enclosure of Stone a " Hundred Cubits about; and Two Mighty Gates to it. Within This Enclosure, is " a Quadrangular Altar, made of unwrought Stones that never any Tool touch'd; " the Superficies of it Twenty Cubits over; and the Depth Ten. Near about it there " stands a Spacious Building, with a Golden Altar, and Candlestick in it, of Two Ta- " lents Weight; and Lamps burning Continually Night and Day. But for Images, " Plants, Groves, &c. as in Other Temples, there was nothing of it. But there are " Priests that pass their time there Day and Night, in Great Purity; and they drink " no Wine at all. The same Author again tells us an Odd Story of a Jew, upon an Expedition, that serv'd under one of Alexander's Successors, and These are his Words. A Description of Jerusalem.

" As I was Travelling One time, says he, toward the Red-Sea, there was one Mo- " sollam in the Company, a Jew, and one of our Horse-Guard, that was look'd upon " to be very Brave, and a Famous Marksman with a Bow and Arrow. As they were " huddling on together, a Southsayer that took upon him to foretell the Fortune of " their Voyage, bad them all Stand; and they did so. This Jew ask'd them what " they stood for? Look ye, says the Cunning-man, and shew'd him a Bird, If That The Power of Imagination. " Bird stands, says he, You are to stand: If it rises, and flies on, You are to go for- " ward too; but if the Bird takes its Flight the Contrary way, You must all go back a- " gain. The Jew, without any more Words, lets fly an Arrow, and kills the Bird. " The Diviner, and his Companions fell presently upon the Jew in most Outrageous " Terms. Why certainly, says the other, You are all Mad, to make such a Bustle about " a Foolish Bird. How should That Poor Wretch pretend to tell us Our Fortune, that " knew nothing of its own? If this Bird could have foreseen Good or Evil to come, it " would have kept it self out of the way of This Arrow. But here's enough of Hecatæus; and they that desire more of him, may fetch it out of the Book it self.

Only one Word now out of Agatharchides, not as any Friend of ours; but I take him in Charity to be no Malicious Enemy. " He tells a Story how Stratonice cast off " her Husband Demetrius, and pass'd out of Macedonia into Syria with a Design to " Marry the King Seleucus. But Seleucus not Answering her Expectation, she stirr'd " up a Commotion in Antioch, while he was with his Army in Babylon. At his Re- " turn, he took Antioch; and Stratonice, making away for Seleucia, she was taken, " and it cost her her Life. Now her only Course had been to have taken her Passage by Sea: but she was diverted from it by a Dream. Agatharchides reflecting upon Stratonice's Superstition, takes an Occasion to treat more at large upon That Topique; and so enters upon an Invective against the Jews.

" The People, says he, they call Jews, are possess'd of a City by the Name of Jeru- The Strictness of the Jewish Sabbath. " salem; a Place of an Impregnable Strength. They have a Custom there of resting " the Seventh Day, without either bearing of Arms, or Tilling the Ground, or at- " tending any Common Business whatsoever: but they employ it wholly in their " Temples, and upon their Devotions, from the Morning to the Evening.

" Ptolemæus

" Ptolemæus the Son of Lagus made his Advantage of This Cuſtom, and Enter'd " the City with an Army upon That Day. And what came of it? But when the " Jews ſhould have been defending their Lives and Liberties, their Heads were alto- " gether taken up with the Superſtitious Foolery of not Violating their Sabbaoth: " and ſo they deliver'd themſelves up to an Inſupportable Tyranny; which taught " them by Experience, the Unwarrantable Foundation of ſo Pernicious a Law: From " hence it is that Men fly to Dreams and Opinions; never Conſidering that Things " Neceſſary are not to be Controul'd by Humane Reaſon. This is Agatharchides's way of Ridiculing our Conduct: But whoſoever paſſes a Sober Judgment upon the whole matter, will find the Proceeding grounded upon the moſt Glorious Foundation of Honour and Virtue; for what can be more Heroical than to Poſtpone Life and Country to the Duty we Owe to God's Holy Laws and Religion?

Agatharchides Reflects upon it.

There are many Hiſtorians, 'tis true, that liv'd in the ſame Age with us, and yet ſay nothing of us; not out of Ignorance, but Envy rather, or ſome other Spiteful Paſſion, as will be made appear. Jerome was a Co-temporary with Hecatæus, and wrote a Book Entituled, Of the Succeſſors of Alexander. He was the Favourite of King Antigonus, and had the Government of Syria. Now Hecatæus wrote a Complete Volume of our Affairs, and Jerome has not ſo much as One Word of us: though we did in a manner draw the ſame Air together. But Men act according to their differing Inclinations: Some are for tranſmitting the Memory of the Good Things that are in us to Poſterity; and Others, for ſuppreſſing them, to the Scandal even of Truth it ſelf.

The Jews Juſtify'd.

But we are not yet without Evidence Sufficient to Juſtifie our Claim; as the Ægyptians, Chaldæans and Phœnicians; the Greeks over and above: for beſides thoſe before mention'd, there's Theophilus, Theodotus, Mnaſeas, (a) Ariſtophanes, Hermogenes, Euemerus, Conon, Zopyrion; and many Others perhaps more than I am aware of, that have particularly made mention of us. Now the Greater part of Theſe Authors muſt undoubtedly be in the Dark, as to the Hiſtory of the Firſt Ages of the World for want of the Holy Scriptures for their Guide: But they all agree however in a Common Acknowledgment of our Antiquity; and That's as much as we deſire. As for Demetrius Phalereus, the Elder Philon, and Eupolemus; they are not much out of the way, and deſerve to be born withall for want of the Means of being better Inform'd.

There is yet One Article behind that I have oblig'd my ſelf to clear: That is to ſay; I am to diſprove All theReproaches and Scandals that have been Caſt upon us, and to Expoſe the Authors of them upon the Credit of their Own Witneſſes; for they have ſpoken as much againſt Themſelves as againſt Us. But the Spite and Partiality of Paſſionate Writers is no New Thing to Men that are Converſant in Hiſtory: Some Exerciſe their Malignity upon Whole Nations, Cities, Manners, &c. ſome, in ſhort, upon One thing, ſome upon Another; as Theopompus did by the Athenians; Polycrates, by the Lacedæmonians; and the Author of Tripoliticus (not Theopompus, as ſome Imagine) did by the Thebans. Timæus hath been very Foul alſo both upon Theſe People and Others: and it is ſtill their Way to derogate from what is moſt Excellent. Some out of Malevolence and Envy; Others to get themſelves a Name by ſetting up for the Authors of Extravagant Stories. By which Means they paſs with Fools for Wiſe Men; and with Wiſe Men for Fools. This is their way of Defaming the Jews; and to gratify the Ægyptians they Endeavour to blaſt the Truth it ſelf.

The Ægyptians Partial and Prepoſſeſs'd.

The Ægyptians being known to be our Enemies, there was no Better way to Gratifie Thoſe People, than to Diſguiſe and Falſify the Story, both of our Forefathers coming into Ægypt, and That of their going out again: For they Hated and Envy'd us for many Reaſons. Firſt, For growing ſo Powerful and Conſiderable, while we were among them; and afterwards ſo Happy when we were from them. The Diverſity of Religions was Another Cauſe of Feud; there being the ſame Difference in Proportion, betwixt their Religion and Ours, that we find betwixt the Divine Purity and Created Nature, for they made Gods of their Beaſts, and Worſhipp'd Brute Animals, one with another indifferently. This was the Doctrine they drew in with their Mother's Milk: and That Prepoſſeſſion, render'd Theſe Fooliſh People Incapable of Better Things. They had a Mortal Hatred for the Proſelytes that came over to us; and they are ſunk to ſuch a Sottiſh Abjection of Mind, that they made no Difficulty of Contradicting Themſelves, and giving the Lye to their own Records. This ſhall be made good out of the Authority of a Great Man of their Own, whom I have already made uſe of in Proof of our Antiquity.

Manethon's Ægyptian Hiſtory.

When Manethon was upon his Egyptian Hiſtory, he paſs'd a Solemn Proteſtation that he would Faithfully Extract it out of the Holy Scriptures; " and ſo he Prefaces his " Diſcourſe with a Story of our Anceſtors carrying an Army into Ægypt, and ſub- " duing

(a) Lat. Ariphanes.

" duing the Country: but that being driven out again soon after, they settled them" selves in a Province that is now call'd Judæa; Built a City by the Name of Jeru-
" salem, and Erected a Temple. Thus far he follows Antiquity. But when he comes afterward to give himself a Loose, and to deliver Vulgar Rumours and Traditions, (as he calls them) the Fables he raises of Us are altogether Incredible, for he makes no more of us than a Rabble of Ægyptian Lepers, and Other Infected Persons promiscuously jumbled together, that were driven out of Ægypt for their Uncleanness. He Fancies them a King too by the Fictitious Name of Amenophis; but was so Conscious of the Imposture, that he durst not venture upon Calculating the Precise Time of his Reign, as he does in other Cases; for the Connexion would Betray him. Under This Cover he tacks several Idle Tales to his History; wherein he had almost forgotten his Own Reckoning: That is to say; that it was now Five Hundred and Eighteen Years since the Shepherds went out of Ægypt toward Jerusalem; for it was in the Reign of (a) Themosis that they departed. From Themosis to the Two Brothers Sethon and Hermæus, the Government continued in a Succession for Three Hundred Ninty Three Years. " Sethon, he says, was Otherwise call'd Ægyp-
" tus, and Hermæus was call'd Danaus; whom Sethon supplanted, and then kept the " Government Fifty Nine Years. His Eldest Son (b) Rhampses succeeded him, and
" Reign'd Sixty Six Years. Now after Owning the Departure of our Predecessors out of Ægypt so many Years before, he casts the Mock King Amenophis into the Royal List, and makes him a Prince of Divine Speculations; like Orus, he says, One of his Predecessors: and says further, " That he had a mind to see the Gods, where-
" in one Amenophis the Son of Papius, and a Priest of Their way, so far gratify'd
" him, that he told him his Desire should be Granted; upon Condition, that the " Kingdom might be Clear'd of all Lepers, and Other Unclean Persons. This Ame-
" nophis, says Manetho, was a Person of such a Reputation for a Holy Man and a " Prophet, that the King was Overjoy'd at the Promise, and presently gather'd to" gether out of Ægypt a Multitude of Infirm, Foul, and Sickly People, to the Number " of Fourscore Thousand, and sent them away to the East-ward of the Nile, to work
" in Quarries there, with a Mixture of other Ægyptians to whom that service was al" lotted. There were, says he, Leprous Priests also, and Learned Men intermingled " with the rest.

A Foolish Story of One Amenophis.

Manetho carries it on; that " This Wise Heavenly Man, in a Horror of Con" science for what he had done, and in the Dread of a judicial Vengeance from " Heaven upon himself, for giving That Violent Counsel, and upon the King for " taking it; finding by a Revelation that Divine Justice, to Balance the Tyrannical
" Oppression of their Sufferings, had in Providence appointed them the Govern" ment of Ægypt for Thirteen Years: The Priest durst not speak one word of This to the King, but committed the Inspiration to Writing, and so laid Violent Hands upon Himself. This Frighted the King: And the Author goes on as follows, Word for Word.

" The King being now ply'd with Petitions on the Behalf of These Miserable
" People, and particularly for some Place of Retreat where they might live safe and " Easy, they pitch'd upon (c) Avaris, formerly known by the Name of Typhon, and " the seat of the Shepherds. The Prince granted them This Boon; and they were " no sooner settled in it, but finding it a Commodious Post for a Rebellion, they listed
" themselves under Osarsiph, a Priest of Heliopolis, and took an Oath of Fidelity
" to him in Whatever he should Command them: Upon These Preliminary Con" ditions, that they should neither Worship any of the Ægyptians Gods, nor abstain
" from any of the Meats that they account Holy, nor Intermarry but with People of " their Own Opinion. When they had gone thus far in Opposition to the Ægyptians
" Interest and Customs, the Commander presently Order'd the Fortifying and the Wall" ing-in of the City, and the Levying of War against Amenophis: Who taking " Other Priests along with him, sent an Embassy to the Shepherds at Jerusalem, " whom King Themosis had forced away out of Ægypt; with Instructions to the " Deputies to advice upon the Common Cause, and to invite them into a League
" against Ægypt, with a Promise to joyn in the Confederacy, and receive into Avaris
" the seat of their Ancestors; where they were sure they could want Nothing;
" but they might fight when they found it Convenient; and with all the Ease in " the World make themselves Masters of the Province. They were transported with " Joy at This Proposal, and immediately drew-out to the Number of Two Hun" dred Thousand Men, and so March'd away outright to Avaris.

" Amenophis, upon the News of This Invasion, was at his Witt's End what to " think of the Prophetical Paper the Priest left behind him: And so immediately

(a) Gr. Τέθμωσις. (b) Gr. Ῥάμψης. (c) Gr. Ἄβαρις.

" call'd a Great Council of his Princes and People together, and ſent away all the " Beaſts that paſs'd for Sacred among the Ægyptians, with a ſtrict Order to the Prieſts " to keep all their Idols as Cloſe as Poſſible. He Committed his Son Sethon, Other- " wiſe called Romaſſes, (a) after his Fathers Name, Rhampſes, a Child of Five Years " of Age, to the Care of a Particular Friend: And ſo Marched away Himſelf in the " Head of Three Hundred Thouſand Fighting Men to Encounter the Enemy. But upon " ſecond Thoughts, and a Check of Conſcience, he turn'd ſhort without fighting, and went " his way to Memphis; where He and his People took ſhipping, and with Apis and the " reſt of their Gods, fled into Æthiopia. The King of the Country gave Him and his " People ſo Generous a Reception, that they wanted for nothing the Place afforded; " either Proviſions, or Habitations, for their Entertainment and Convenience, to " ſerve them the Whole Courſe of That Fatal Thirteen Years Baniſhment. Thus it " far'd with the Ægyptians in Æthiopia; beſide that they had a Guard allow'd them " upon the Frontier for the ſafety of their King's Perſon.

" But in the mean time the Jeruſalem Auxiliaries made infinitely more Ravage " in Ægypt, than They that call'd them in: For there was nothing they ſtuck at " that was either Inhumane, or Wicked; and the very Spectacle of their Impiety was a " Calamity not to be Expreſs'd. The Raſing, Burning and Rifling of Towns and " Villages was nothing to them; without Sacrilege, and breaking the Images of their " Gods to pieces over and above: Moſt barbarouſly tearing the Conſecrated Creatures " that the Ægyptians ador'd, Limb from Limb; forcing the Prieſts and Prophets to " be the Executioners of them Themſelves, and then turning them-off Naked.

The Author ſays yet further, " that the Founder of that Polity was one Oſarſiph, a " Prieſt of Heliopolis, ſo called from Oſyris a God that was Worſhip'd there: And he " ſays that This Prieſt Changing his Religion, Changed his Name too, and called him- " ſelf Moſes. This is an Ægyptian Story of the Jews; but Contracted for Brevity- ſake.

Manetho ſays yet again that " Amenophis and his Son Rhampſes marched afterward " out of Æthiopia with Two Great Armies; Encountr'd the Shepherds and the Le- " pers; Routed, and had the Chaſe of them with a very Great Slaughter, to the Borders of Syria. This is the Account we have from Manetho; which is moſt Ridi- culouſly Trivial and Childiſh, as will Evidently appear.

Joſeph's Reflections upon the Abſurdities of the Whole.

He gives it for granted, in the Firſt place, that our Forefathers were not Originally of Ægypt, but came thither from Abroad; reduced the Country; and after That, quitted it. But as to our Mingling afterwards with the Ægyptian Lepers, and Moſes that led us out of the Land of Ægypt, being one of them: This is ſo Pal- pable a Falſehood, that it will be prov'd out of his Own Mouth to have been many Ages before. Now This is not only a Fiction; but the Foundation of it as Ridicu- lous, as it is Falſe.

King Amenophis, he ſays, had a mind to ſee the Gods. What Gods I beſeech you? For the Oxe, the Goat, the Crocodile, and the Baboon may be ſeen at any time: And Theſe are the Gods that they Worſhip. But if he means Celeſtial Gods, they are altogether Inviſible. And what was it that put This Conceit in his Head now? Why, Another King it ſeems had ſeen them before. And why might not he as well have been told What they were, and How they look'd, without any further Trouble? Very good! But the Prophet, they ſay, that ſet him agog upon This Fancy was a good, and a Wiſe Man; and one that the King did very much Confide in: That is, to ſay, that he would do a Thing impoſſible to be done. But he fail'd of his End however. In one word more; why muſt the Gods be ever the more Inviſible at laſt, becauſe Men are Cripples, or Lepers? They are Offended at us for Ill manners, not for Corporal Defects. And how ſhall it enter into any Man's Head to imagine, that ſo many Thouſand Diſeaſed and Impotent Perſons ſhould be brought together at ſo ſhort a Warning? or how came it that the King did not follow the Direction of his Prophets; and rather baniſh them according to his Order, than Condemn them to the Mines and the Quarries? As if his Buſineſs had been rather to get Work- men than to Purge the Province. And then he makes the Prophet kill himſelf in the Dread of a Divine Vengeance, and leave the King in a Writing the Fate of Ægypt. But how came the Prophet not to foreſee his Own Deſtruction as well as the reſt? Why did he not Diſſuade the King from the Vanity of his Fantaſtical Longing? Or to what End did he trouble himſelf about a Calamity, that was not to take place till he ſhould be dead and gone? Or was the Miſery he fear'd Worſe than Death it ſelf? But the moſt ſottiſh part of the ſtory is yet behind.

" The King heard of This, he ſays: And mightily troubled he was to think what " might come of it. And what did he do, I beſeech you? Why, Inſtead of Purging

Ægypt,

Ægypt as he ſhould have done of the Sick and Unclean, he reſtor'd them, upon their Firſt Asking, to Avaris, the Habitation of their Forefathers: And there they made Choice of the High-Prieſt of Heliopolis for their Prince and Governour; and to him they ſwore Allegeance; in Particular, that they would neither worſhip any of their Gods, nor forebear eating any of their Privileg'd Meats but deſtroy all as much as in Them lay, that the Ægyptians Eſteemed ſacred; and Contract no Marriages but with their Confederates. Theſe were the Meaſures that the Multitude bound themſelves by Oath to live and die by. In fine, they fortify'd Avaris, he ſays, and took up Arms againſt the King; ſending to Jeruſalem for Aſſiſtance with a Promiſe of putting it into their Hands, (as their ſtation of Old) not doubting but from thence, upon a Conjunction, they might Eaſily make themſelves Maſters of All Ægypt. He follows the Story that they advanced with Two Hundred Thouſand Men; but that Amenophis the Ægyptian King, becauſe he would not fight againſt God, took his Flight into Æthiopia, and took Apis and all his Deify'd Animals along with him; And that afterwards, the Jews breaking in upon Ægypt, laid their Towns Waſt, and then ſet Fire both to their Cities and Temples; put their Nobility to the ſword, and ſo Committed all manner of Out-rages without Diſtinction or Mercy. The Prieſt, he ſays that had the Adminiſtration of the Government, was a Native of Hieropolis; His Name was Oſarſiph, ſo called, from their God Oſiris: And then aſſuming the Name of Moſes. He ſays that Amenophis fell into Ægypt out of Æthiopia with a Mighty Power in the Thirteenth Year after his Expulſion; and in a Battle with the Shepherds and the Lepers, gain'd a Notable Victory; cut-off great Numbers, and had the Purſuit up to the Skirts of Syria.

Notes upon Manetho.

Manetho was not aware here again how Unmaſterly he tacks his ſtories together. For though the Lepers and the Impotents might think it hard Meaſure at firſt to be ſo Treated by the King, at the Inſtigation of the Prophet; yet when they came afterward to be Eas'd of the ſlavery of the Mines, and to be allow'd the Comfort of a Commodious Habitation, This Fair Uſage one would think ſhould have ſweetned them again: Or, if the Averſion they had to the King was Implacable, Why did they not rather Contrive ſome Practice upon his Perſon, than Imbroil the Publique, where they were all ſo much Concern'd for the ſake of their Relations. But the Conteſt was with Men, not with the Gods; neither would they act Contrary to the Laws they were brought-up in. So that we are now to Con our Thanks to Manetho, for declaring that the Ring-leaders of This Uproar, were none of Thoſe that came out of Jeruſalem; but the very Ægyptians Themſelves, and their Prieſts eſpecially that had ty'd them up by Oath to what they did. What can be more Non-ſenſical than to ſay, That when they ſaw None of the Lepers Friends or Allies would joyn with them in the Rebellion, or bear any part in the Riſque of the War, they were forced to ſend ſome of their ſick People to Jeruſalem for Succour! Well! And upon what Score of Friendſhip, or Intereſt betwixt them? For they were rather to be look'd upon as Enemies, in the Contradictions of their Lives and Manners. But they came, he ſays, at the Firſt Call upon the Promiſe, Hope and Expectation of Being put into the Poſſeſſion of Ægypt; as if They that had been beaten out of Ægypt, had not Underſtood the Condition of the Place. 'Tis true, if they had been in a Neceſſitous ſtarving Condition, it might have been worth their While, but for People at Eaſe, and in a much more Fruitful and Agreeable Country than Ægypt, to run ſuch a Hazzard in favour of their Own Enemies; and Thoſe ſo ſcandalouſly Diſeaſed too, that they would never have been ſuffer'd in a Private Family: Theſe are Extravagances for none but Madmen to be Guilty of. And who could foreſee the King's running away after all This, in the Head of Three Hundred Thouſand Men? For That was the Number, ſays Manetho, that he brought to Peluſium to Encounter the Rebels. He charges it alſo upon the Jeruſalem-Army, that they ſeized the Ægyptians Corn and Proviſions, and brought the Poor People into Great Diſtreſs by Embezeling their ſtores. And what could they expect Leſs now from an Open and a Declar'd Enemy? Eſpecially when the Ægyptians had already done the very ſame thing, and bound themſelves by Oath to Continue the Same Courſe.

What ſhall we ſay then to his Story of the Rout Amenophis gave the Enemy; with the Slaughter and Purſuit of them to the Borders of Syria? Does Ægypt lie ſo Open on all hands, and would not They that had the Menage of the War, when they knew Amenophis was upon the March, ſecure the Paſſes out of Æthiopia; and draw an Army together to Oppoſe him? Which might ſo Eaſily have been done. But he follows them upon the Heel, ſays Manetho, over all the Dry Barren Sands as far as Syria; and doing Execution upon them all the Way he Went. A Likely Matter! To purſue an Enemy with an Army over a Deſert that is hardly Paſſable, even without any Interruption. Here is enough out of Manetho, to ſhew that we neither had our Original from the Ægyptians, nor any Mixture with them. As for the Leprous, Tainted Part of them, we may reckon that there Dy'd many of them in the Quarries; More in the War, and Great Numbers in This laſt Action and Flight. We ſhall proceed now to Examine What Manetho Says concerning Moſes.

Moſes Vindicated from the Scandals of Manetho.

The Ægyptians Themſelves are all agreed upon it, that Moſes was a Man of Singular Integrity and Wiſdom; and they ſtood out at nothing, tho' never ſo Falſe and Infamous, to make an Ægyptian of him: (That is to ſay, their Countrey-man;) and One of the Prieſts of Heliopolis; who was Expell'd, with Several Others, for a Leper. Now we find in the Chronology, that Moſes liv'd Five Hundred and Eighteen Years, before This Conjuncture, and Conducted our Fore-fathers out of Ægypt into the Countrey where we now Inhabit: So that there needs no further Proof that he was no Leper, than what ariſes from his Own Words; i. e. That no Lepers ſhould be admitted into any Towns or Villages, but live apart in a Diſtinct Habit by Themſelves; and that whoever touch'd a Leper, or lodg'd under the ſame Roof with him, ſhould be reputed Unclean: and Whoever ſhould come to be cur'd of That Diſeaſe, and Reſtor'd to his Former State, he ſhould paſs ſome Certain Purifications; Waſh himſelf with Fountain-Water; Shave all his Hair off, and offer ſuch and ſuch Sacrifices, before he ſhould be receiv'd into the Holy City. Now if Moſes had been afflicted with This Diſtemper Himſelf, he would never have been ſo ſevere upon Others for it.

And This Strictneſs of his was not only in the Caſe of Lepers; but no Man was qualify'd for the Prieſthood, that had the leaſt Maim upon him, on any Other Corporal Defect: as it was Deprivation alſo when it happen'd to be the Caſe of a Prieſt. Can any Man think now that if Moſes had been a Leper, he would have made ſuch Laws againſt Himſelf, and ſo much to his Own Shame and Loſs. As to the Change of the Name at laſt, from Oſarſiph to Moſes, What Affinity does there appear betwixt the One and the Other? Where's the Agreement betwixt them? Moy, in Ægyptian, is Water; and Moyſes is as much as preſerv'd out of the Water: And That's the Whole Myſtery. It is now Manifeſt, that ſo long as Manetho kept himſelf to the records of Antiquity, he was not much Wide of the Truth: but when he gives himſelf up to Fiction and Fable, there is no longer any Connection in his Story.

Chæremon, Another Ægyptian Hiſtorian.

I ſhall advance now to Chæremon, Another Ægyptian Hiſtorian; Who ſuppoſes the ſame Names and Perſons of Amenophis and his Son Rameſſes, with Manetho. " He " ſays, that the Goddeſs Iſis appear'd to Amenophis in a Viſion, and Chid him ſeverely for ſuffering her Temple to be ruin'd in the War. And he ſays that Phritiphantes a Holy Scribe, ſuggeſted it to the King, that if he would clear Ægypt of All People labouring under Foul and Malignant Diſtempers, he ſhould never be troubled again with Thoſe Nightly Apparitions. Upon This, there was a Call made of Impotent and Infirm Wretches, and Two Hundred and Fifty Thouſand of them baniſh'd the Place under the Command of Moſes, and Joſeph, Two of the Number, and Holy Men: Moſes in Ægyptian, being called Tiſithes; and Joſeph, Peteſeph. He ſays that they found at Peluſium Three Hundred and Eighty Thouſand Men, that Amenophis had left there, refuſing them a Paſſage into Ægypt. They Struck a League, and joyn'd in an Expedition againſt the Ægyptians: But Amenophis would not ſtand it, and ſo withdrew into Æthiopia, leaving his Wife Big behind him. She Shifted up and down in Caves and Holes, till at length ſhe was deliver'd of a Male-Child that ſhe called Meſſenes; who growing up to Man's Eſtate, drove about Two Hundred Thouſand of the Jews into Syria, and brought back his Father Amenophis out of Æthiopia. Thus far Chæremon.

Theſe Writers Contradict One Another.

There needs no more now to overthrow the Credit of Theſe Writers, than to Confront them. There is no Reconciling of Truth and Error, and no dividing of Truth againſt it ſelf. But when Men fly to Fables and Impoſtures, they write fancy rather than Hiſtory. Manetho imputes the Baniſhment of the Lepers to Amenophis's Curioſity to ſee the Gods: Chæremon to the Viſion of Iſis. The Former makes the Prieſt Amenophis the Adviſer to the Purging of the King's Dominions of the Sick People. The Other ſays it was Phritiphantes. And they agree every jot as well in their Numbers, as in their Stories. One makes them Eighty Thouſand Men: The Other Two Hundred and Fifty Thouſand. Manetho again ſends the Lepers firſt to the Quarries; and after That, Tranſports them to Avaris; where they call to Jeruſalem for Help, and make That the Riſe of the War. Chæremon will have it on the Contrary, that being driven out of Ægypt, they made uſe of Three Hundred and Eighty Thouſand Men at Peluſium, that Amenophis had left there; and with That Body of Men invaded Ægypt, and frighted Amenophis away into Æthiopia. This he tells us; but, (which is Wonderful) not one Word who Theſe Men were; Whence This Vaſt Army came;

Whether

Whether Ægyptians, or Foreigners; or Why Amenophis would not receive them. And then there's Chæremon's Dream of Isis, and the Lepers. He says again, that Moses and Joseph were Expell'd together; Whereas Moses was Dead Four Ages before Joseph's Time; Computing the whole at about a Hundred and Seventy Years. Manetho makes Rameſſes the Son of Amenophis a Baniſht Man with his Father; a Party in the War with him, and Father and Son Fellow-Exiles in Æthiopia. But Chæremon makes him a Poſthumous Child, and born in a Cave after the Death of his Father. In time he grows up to be a Conquerour, and drives away ſome Two Hundred Thouſand Jews into Syria. What a Sottiſh Credulity is This! Without telling us what Theſe Three Hundred and Eighty Thouſand were: Or how t'other Eighty Thouſand Men Periſh'd; whether they fell in Battle, or went over to Rameſſes. But which is the Greateſt Wonder of all he does not ſo much as tell us who they are that he calls Jews; Or to which of the Two Parties he gives That Appellation; whether to the Two Hundred and Fifty Thouſand Lepers, or to the Three Hundred and Eighty Thouſand at Peluſium. But it would be Time loſt to Confute Thoſe That Confute Themſelves: and there is no Conviction ſo Strong as That which comes out of their Own Mouths.

Lyſimachus, a Shameleſs and a Profeſs'd Falſifier.

I come now to Lyſimachus, a Profeſs'd Falſifier, as well as the Reſt; but for the Faculty of an Extravagant Invention, ſo much beyond them all, that he Out-does them all with the Malice of the Fiction. He ſays that, " In the Reign of Bocchoris " King of Ægypt the Jews were ſo Leprous, Scabby and Over-run with Foul " Diſtempers, that they preſs'd into the Temples to beg for Charities. There dy'd " Great Numbers of them of contagious Diſeaſes: Upon which there follow'd a Fa- " mine in Ægypt. Bocchoris, in This Diſtreſs, ſent to Conſult the Oracle of Jupiter " Ammon, about This Dearth: And the Anſwer was This, that he ſhould purifie the " Temples by ſending away all Unclean and Impious Perſons out of them into the De- " ſert, and drowning Thoſe that were Ulcerated and Leprous; for the Sun it ſelf had " a Horror for ſo Abominable a ſight; and this being done, the Earth ſhould bring " forth Fruit again, and Nature return to her Courſe. Bocchoris preſently, upon " This, calls his Prieſts and his Diviners about him; and by their Advice, Orders the " ſick People to be ſorted together, and deliver'd up to the Soldiers: the Lepers and " ſcorbuticks to be lapt up in Lead, and caſt into the Sea; and the Others to be car- " ry'd into the Wilderneſs, and There Expos'd to be ſtarv'd. The Night now com- " ing on, Theſe Poor People began to think what to do with themſelves: So they " made Fires, ſet Watches and Guards, and the Next Night kept a Faſt, to reconcile " themſelves to the Gods whom they had Offended. On the Day following, there " was one Moſes, he ſays, that adviſed them to decamp, and March on all together " till they met with Better Accommodation: With a Charge to do no good Offices " upon the way; Nor ſo much as to give any Man good Counſel that ſhould deſire it; " and likewiſe to break down all the Temples and Altars they found in the way. " Theſe Propoſals were no ſooner Approv'd, and the Reſolution taken, but the Mul- " titude preſently put themſelves upon the March over the Wilderneſs; and after ma- " ny Hardſhips, came at laſt into a Countrey that was both Dreſs'd and Peopled. " They treated the Inhabitants Cruelly to the Higheſt degree; burnt, and Pillag'd " their Temples; and came in the End, to a Place that they now call Judæa, and " Built a City there by the Name of Hieroſula, (according to the Occaſion) being as " much as to ſay the Spoil of Holy Things: But coming afterwards into Power and Re- " putation, they were aſham'd of their Own Name, and changed Hieroſula into Hie- " roſoluma, and call'd themſelves after their City.

We have here a Third King quite different from the Two Former Kings of Manetho and Chæremon; who, without one Word of the Dream and the Ægyptian Prophet, went to ask Council of the Oracle about the Lepers and Other Unclean Perſons. He ſays, That the Jews gather'd together in Multitudes about the Temples. Does he mean the Lepers by the Jews? As if the Jews were only tainted with That Diſeaſe; for he ſeems ſo to reſtrain it in calling them the People of the Jews. But why does he not tell us alſo whether he means Natives, or Strangers? If Ægyptians, Why does he call them Jews? Or if Strangers, Why does he not tell us whence they came? And then again, if there were ſo many of them drown'd, and the reſt thrown out into Deſerts, How came there to be ſo many left; and How came they likewiſe to paſs the Wilderneſs; poſſeſs the Countrey; Erect a City; and to Build the moſt Glorious Temple in the World?

How comes he now again to give us only the Bare Name of our Law-giver, without any thing of his Countrey; his Perſon, or his Family? And how came he to make ſuch Extravagant Laws in his Paſſage, to the Diſhonour both of Gods and Men? Either Theſe Exiles were Ægyptians, or Not. If the Former, they would hardly caſt off their Country's Laws on a Sudden. Or if they came from Elſewhere, they had undoubtedly Certain Meaſures and Cuſtoms of their Own, that they could not Eaſily part with. It is likewiſe to be Conſider'd, that if they had joyn'd in an Oath of Confederacy againſt Thoſe that drove them out, they might have had a Plauſible Colour for it: But for a Company of Miſerable Friendleſs Wretches, as they Own themſelves, to Engage in a Mortal Feud and Defiance againſt all Mankind; What Greater Folly could there be in the World, bating only the Fiction of ſo Ridiculous a Story! And yet the Conceit of the Name, with an Alluſion to the City, and afterwards changing it, makes the Foolery all of a piece. But how came the Name now, which was at That time, as he ſays, ſo Great a Scandal to the City, to be accounted afterwards ſo Great an Honour to the Inhabitants? Now This Angry Author was ſo Intent, I ſuppoſe, upon Spite and Miſchief, that he took Hieroſoluma for the ſame Thing in Hebrew, that it is in Greek. But what Need Many Words, for the Expoſing of an Impoſture that has the Confidence to Contradict and to Diſprove it ſelf. Beſide that it is High time, to put an End to This Book, and paſs to the Next; Wherein I propound, to make Good my Undertaking.

Answer to APION about the Antiquity of the JEWS.

BOOK II.

HAVING Already given sufficient Proof of the Antiquity of our Nation, upon the Credit of several Phœnician, Chaldæan, and Ægyptian Historians; together with Other Greek Authors, in my Reflections upon Manetho, Chæremon, &c. After This Right, I say, done to the Common Cause, in the Foregoing Treatise, I shall now (My Dearest Epaphroditus) turn my Discourse more particularly to my Personal Adversaries, and to Apion the Grammarian, in the First place; (If at least such a one may be Worth taking Notice of.) As to his Relations, they are Vulgar, and Fabulous, after the Way of That Foul-Mouth'd Sort of People; the Air of his Writings, Flat and Heavy; Palpable Ignorance over and above, and a Vein of Calumny running from One End of them to the Other; a Mixture, in fine, that speaks the Compositor to be Unmannerly, Violent and Troublesome, to the Highest degree. But yet Considering that there are more Fools in the World than Wise Men; and that Fools are better pleas'd with Fooleries than with Matters of more Gravity and Weight; and considering again, how many there are that had rather hear their Neighbours traduc'd, than Well Spoken of; I find my self under some kind of Necessity to call This Fond False Man to an Account for the Grossness of his Arrogance, in making himself Judge of the Cause: But then I have This Encouragement on the Other hand, that People are Generally well enough Content to see the Mischief of Malicious Scandals and Clamours turn'd upon the Heads of the Authors.

Apion, a Dark, a Course, and a Fabulous Writer.

As to his very Manner of Writing, it is so Dark, and Intricate, that there's hardly any Guessing what he would be at; in the Confusion, Contradictions, and Inconsistence of his Stories. One while, he mistakes the History of our Fore-fathers departing out of Ægypt, the same way that Others have done, whom I have already Confuted. Another while, he falls foul upon the Alexandrian Jews; and then lashes out into Out-rages against the Rites and Ceremonies of our Holy Temple and Worship.

Joseph's Remarks upon Apion's Follies and Mistakes.

Now as to the Two Points of our Fore-fathers coming Originally out of Ægypt, and of their being driven out again, for any Foul Disease, or Infectious Distemper, or any Other Reason of That kind: I have said more than needed, to the Clearing of Those Two Imputations. So that I shall only Summ up what Apion hath added over and above, and particularly in the Third Book of his Ægyptian History. Moses, he says, was by Birth, of Heliopolis, as I have heard from the Oldest Men upon the Place, of my Time. The People formerly had their Religious Meetings in the Open Air, till Moses that was well-skill'd in the Worship of his Countrey, brought their Congregations out of the Fields into Private Houses in the City: Enjoyning the People to address their Prayers still toward the Sun. Now with a Respect to the Situation of the Place, there were, instead of Obelisques, Certain Pillars advanc'd upon the Figures of Basins with Engravings upon Them; and the Shadow falling upon These Basins, (for all was open above) still as the Sun mov'd, the Shadow mov'd along with it.

The Whole Story Ridiculous from One End to the Other.

This was the Rare Conceit of our Wonderful Grammarian. But I shall rather leave the Confutation of him to the Writings of Moses, than take it upon my self. As for Moses; he gives no Account, either of any such Form prescrib'd, or made Use of, at the First Erecting of the Tabernacle; or that he ever order'd Posterity to do any thing like it: Neither was Solomon (afterward the Founder of the Jerusalem-Temple) ever aware of any such Phantastical Curiosity, as Apion Speaks of.

As

As to the Authorities he cites, of the Old Men that told him Moſes was a Heliopolitan; he was too Young, it ſeems, to know it Himſelf, and therefore Conſulted ſome of his Co-temporaries, which, he ſays, were well Acquainted with him. Was there ever ſo Rank or ſo Ridiculous a Contrivance! Apion could not find out what Country-man, either Homer, or Pythagoras was; though the Latter but of Yeſterday in Compariſon. How comes he then to be ſo Poſitive in the Caſe of Moſes that liv'd ſo many Ages before them: and All This upon the Credit of what he had heard Old Men ſay.

And Theſe Hiſtorians are no leſs divided about the Time of Moſes's leading the Lepers, the Lame and the Blind out of Ægypt. Manetho makes it to be in the Reign of Tethmoſis, ſome Three Hundred Ninety Three Years before the Baniſhing of Danaus to Argos. Lyſimachus will have it in the Reign of King Bocchoris: That is to ſay, Seven Hundred Years before Molon, and ſeveral Others reckon According to their Own Phancy. But Apion, that ſets up for the Oracle of the Whole Party, Pitchs the Time preciſely upon the Firſt Year of the Seventh Olympiad: the very Year, he ſays, of the Building of Carthage. He makes mention of Carthage, as a Token that would infallibly Confirm the Truth of his Computation: Whereas, at the ſame time, without Conſidering what he does, he furniſhes Arguments and Evidence againſt himſelf: at leaſt if any heed may be given in This Caſe to the Phœnician Records; for we find in That Hiſtory that Hiram liv'd at leaſt a Hundred and Fifty Years before the Building of Carthage, as we have prov'd already out of the Phœnician Annals: and that he had a Particular Friendſhip and Veneration for Solomon, the Founder of the Temple at Jeruſalem, and Contributed Materials in Abundance toward the Perfecting of That Work. But Solomon, in fine, laid the Foundations of the Temple Six Hundred and Twelve Years after the Jews went out of Ægypt.

As to the Number of the Exiles, Apion agrees in the ſame Falſe Account with Lyſimachus, of a Hundred and Ten Thouſand. But then the Original he gives of the Word Sabbath, is Childiſh, even to Admiration. " When the Jews, ſays he, had " been Six Days upon the way, they were ſeized with Ulcers, and Inflammations a- " bout the Groin: and for This Reaſon they reſted the Seventh-Day. And being now " ſafely arriv'd in the Country, called at preſent, Judæa, they gave the Day the " Name of the Sabbath; from the Egyptian Sabbatoſis; which is as much as to ſay, " the Diſeaſe of the Groin, as aforeſaid. Was there ever ſo Senſeleſs, and ſo Odious a Rabble of Fooleries patch'd together, and Impos'd upon the World under the Face and Countenance of a Hiſtory? A Hundred and Ten Thouſand Men all labouring under the ſame Diſtemper! And if they were Blind likewiſe, Lame and Languiſhing, as Apion elſewhere reports them; how was it poſſible for ſuch an Infirm Multitude of Men to hold out, but ſo much as One Day's Journey in the Deſert! And This was not All neither; for they were to cut their way thorough all Oppoſition over and above. Is it not a Likely Thing, I ſay, that a Hundred and Ten Thouſand Men ſhould All fall Ill at the ſame time, of the ſame Diſeaſe? This could never be according to the Ordinary Courſe of Nature: and it would be the Groſſeſt of Blunders to impute it to Chance.

And is it not an Admirable Fancy of Apion's, the bringing of a Hundred and Ten Thouſand Sick and Weak Men, Safe and Sound, every Soul of them, to Judæa in Six Days! And then what a Story does he tell you of Moſes's Advancing up to Mount Sinai, betwixt Ægypt and Arabia, and lying cloſe there for Forty days; till coming down in the End, he deliver'd the Law to the Jews. I would fain know now how it is Poſſible for ſuch a Body of Men to March over ſo Vaſt a Deſert in Six days; or to Subſiſt Forty days in a place that Affords neither Bread nor Water.

His trifling with the Grammatical Reaſon of the Word Sabbath, is frivolous to the laſt degree of Impertinence and Folly; for there is a Mighty Difference betwixt the Two Words Sabbo and Sabbatum: by the Latter, we Underſtand the Jews Day of Reſt; and the Other he Expounds Himſelf, to be only the Name of the Ægyptian Diſeaſe. This may paſs for a Supplement of Certain New Fables, that Apion has Superadded to the Story of Moſes, and ſo for the Jews going out of Ægypt, that were never heard of before. But where's the Wonder for a Man to bely Other People, that firſt claſhes with Himſelf? He was born at Oaſis in Ægypt; but renounces the place of his Nativity to be thought an Alexandrian; which ſhews what Opinion he hath of the Ægyptians: for That's the Name he gives to all People, whom he would repreſent for the worſt of Men: And This is it that makes him take ſuch Pains to diſguiſe his Extraction, and ſhuffle off his Original. They that glory in the Dignity of their Country, reckon it a Point of Honour to make good their Title, and to Maintain the Rights and Privileges belonging to it, againſt all Violence and Intruſion. Now This is the Caſe of the Ægyptians, with a Reſpect to Us. Either they claim Country and Kin'red Kin'red of us, on the One Hand; where they pretend to value Themselves upon that Relation: Or where they take themselves to ly under a Scandal, they are Willing, on the Other Side, that we should bear our Part in the Reproach. But Apion menages all his Outragrous Passions against Us; as if his Bus'ness were to Gratify the Alexandrians, for allowing him the Freedom of their City: Well Understanding the Mortal Feud there was at That time betwixt Them and the Alexandrian Jews; and still though he pretended to Expose only one sort of Jews, the Venom of his Calumny and Malice Extended to the whole Race.

But what were the Grievous and Intolerable Indignities all this while, that He Charges with so much Bitterness upon the Alexandrian Jews? The Jews, says Apion, upon their coming out of Syria, settled themselves along the Coast, at a Place within the wash of the Tide; but no Port at hand for a Vessel to Ride in. Well! And was not Apion much to blame now to cast a Scandal upon so Famous a City; and a City he so much glory'd in (how Vainly and Falsely soever) as the Place of his Nativity! For That Quarter is a Dependency upon Alexandria, and Universally reputed a most Commodious Habitation. If the Jews took it by Force, and so maintain'd it against all Opposition, so much the more to their Honour.

The Jews had several Eminent Benefactors.

But to deliver the Plain Truth of the matter, it was Alexander the Great that put the Jews into Possession of it, and granted to them the same Freedoms and Immunities with the Macedonians Themselves. But what would Apion have said now, if instead of an Establishment in This Royal City, they had had their Residence allotted them at Necropolis: and if their Tribes were yet call'd Macedonians to This very Day. But either Apion hath read the Epistles of King Alexander, Ptolemy the Son of Lagus, and the Succeeding Kings of Egypt; the Inscriptions that Cæsar caused to be Engraven upon the Pillar at Alexandria, in memory of the Privileges by him granted to the Jews: Apion, I say, hath either Read These Memorials, or he hath not; If the Former, he must needs be a very Ill Man to write Things so Contrary to his Knowledge; and the Other way, he has forefeited his Credit, as well for his Ignorance, as for his Spite.

A Nonsensical Cavil.

And he is as much out again too in his Wonderment at the Jews calling themselves Alexandrians; for it speaks him very little skill'd, either in Common Sense, or in Practice. Do we not know that All Colonies take their Names from the First Founders? And we shall not need to look out for Foreign Instances, having so many nearer Home. The Jews of Antioch we call Antiochians; Our Forefathers being made Free of That City by King Seleucus; And so the Jews of Ephesus, are called Ephesians; and Those of Ionia, Ionians: To which Right they stand Entitled by the Successive Privileges of Former Grants. And This is a Grace that the State of Rome hath vouchsafed, not only to Particular Persons, but to whole Provinces and Nations. How came the Ancient Iberians; the Tuscans, and the Sabines to be called Romans Else? Now if Apion will not allow the Benefit of This Common Liberty to Others, why does he claim it to himself, in taking upon him the Name of an Alexandrian? What Pretence hath any Man (according to his Rule) that was Born in the Inland Part of Egypt to write himself an Alexandrian, and Especially an Egyptian; Those People being the Men of the whole World to whom the Masters of it, the Romans, refuse This Liberty? But our Envious Historian lying under an Incapacity of Pretending to This Advantage himself, turns his Displeasure against Those that are in a Rightful Possession of it.

The Jews Highly in Favour with Alexander.

In the Erecting of This City, Alexander made use of the Assistance and Service of the Jews; not for want of Men, but in the Testimony and Approbation of their Faith and Integrity, and with a Resolution to do them further Honour and Respect Alexander, says Hecatæus, had such a Tenderness for the Modesty and Loyalty of the Jews, that beside Other signal Bounties, he gave them the Province of Samaria, over and above, Tax-Free.

And so with Ptolemy the Son of Lagus.

After Alexander, came Ptolemy the Son of Lagus; who had every jot as good on Opinion of the Alexandrian Jews, as his Predecessor, and into Their Hands he Committed the Trust of All the Forts and Strong Holds in Ægypt. And for his Better Security he planted Cyrene, and other Cities of Libya, with These People.

Ptolemy Philadelphus.

Ptolemy Philadelphus Succeeded Ptolemy the Son of Lagus; who did not only set all the Jewish Prisoners at liberty that he had in his Country, but remitted them several Duties, and other Summs of Money: and which was more than all the rest, he Contracted a Passionate Inclination to be Instructed in our Laws and Customs, and in the Holy Mysteries of the Sacred Scriptures: insomuch that he press'd Earnestly for Interpreters to be sent him in Order to his Better Information. Now for the more speedy Advance of the Work, the Care of it was Committed to Demetrius Phalereus, Andreas, and Aristeus (No Common Men): Demetrius the Miracle of his Age for Learning and Virtue; the other Two Captains of the Guards of his Body; to whom was Committed the Care of the Work. It is not to be thought now that This Prince could ever have had ſuch a Veneration for the Jewiſh Laws and Cuſtoms, and for the Piety and Wiſdom of our Forefathers, without a ſuitable Reverence and Affection for the Profeſſors of Theſe Holy Rules and Methods. But Apion muſt be very little read in That Hiſtory if he did not know that the Jews were highly in Favour with almoſt the whole Race of the Macedonian Kings.

Ptolemy Euergetes. The Third Ptolemy (call'd Euergetes) having made Himſelf Maſter of Syria by Force, paid no Solemnity of Acknowledgments for his Victory, to the Ægyptian Gods; but ſacrific'd, and gave God Thanks in the Temple at Jeruſalem after the Manner of the Jews.

Ptolemy Philometer. Ptolemy Philometer and the Queen Cleopatra committed the Charge of the Whole Government to Onias, and Doſitheus, which were Both Jews. Apion meanly derogates from the Action; whereas he ſhould rather have thank'd them for preſerving That Alexandria, whereof he very falſely pretended Himſelf to be a Citizen. For when Ægypt was up in a Rebellion, and upon the very Brink of being irrecoverably Loſt, Theſe Two Jews ſet all Right again. Soon after This, Onias enter'd the Place (ſays Apion) with a ſmall Army, in the Preſence of Thermus the Roman Embaſſadour: And This is all he ſays of the Exploit, though it cannot be deny'd to have been a Brave and a Generous Action.

Ptolemy Phyſcon ſucceeds Ptolemy Philometer. Upon the Death of This Ptolemy Philometer, Ptolemy Phyſcon the Son, march'd out of Cyrene with a Deſign to Force Cleopatra * and the King's Sons out of Ægypt, and Uſurp the Kingdom to himſelf. Upon This Ground it was that Onias made War upon Phyſcon, in Defence of Cleopatra, like a True Friend to a Crown'd Head, as well in Adverſity as in Proſperity. But there never was a more Remarkable Inſtance of God's Power and Juſtice than upon This Occaſion. For when Ptolemy was ready to joyn Battle with Onias, he caus'd all the Jews in Alexandria, Men, Women and Children to be Stript and Bound, and ſo thrown Naked to the Elephants to be trampled to Death: And the Beaſts were made Drunk too, to Enflame their Fury. But in the Concluſion, and beyond all Expectation, the Elephants quitted the Jews, and turning their Rage Another Way, they deſtroy'd a great many of Ptolemy's Beſt Friends. In This Inſtant of Time, there appeared to him a Hideous Figure, with a Menacing Precaution to him to leave Perſecuting the Jews: and the Favourite Miſtreſs of all his Concubines; (Some call'd her Ithaca; Others, Hirene) Joyning in the ſame Office of Mediation; the Interceſſion wrought ſo effectually upon him, that he not only granted the Requeſt, but heartily repented himſelf of all the Cruelties that he had either actually Committed, or Intended. This is a Truth ſo Notorious, that the Jews of Alexandria keep to This Day an Anniverſary Feſtival in Memory of their Deliverance. And yet ſuch is the Spiteful Malevolence of Apion, That Enemy of Mankind, that he takes upon him to reproach the Jews for Joyning in This War againſt Phyſcon, as an Impious Action; whereas he ſhould rather have extoll'd it as a Laudable Piece of Juſtice.

Apion celebrates the Laſt Cleopatra though the Lewdeſt of Women. And ſo for the Laſt Cleopatra that Reign'd in Alexandria, how does Apion Celebrate That Queen, and lay all the Blame at our Door: only becauſe ſhe was Ungrateful to us? Why does he not expoſe her in the Lewdneſs of her Life and Manners? In her Iniquity and Falſeneſs to the Tendereſt of Husbands, Friends, and Relations: to the Romans in General, and to her Imperial Benefactors? Did ſhe not cauſe her Own Siſter Arſinoë to be put to Death in the Temple without a Crime? Did ſhe not as treacherouſly Murder her Brother? Did ſhe not rifle the Temples of the Gods of her Anceſtors, and the Sepulchres of her Forefathers? Did ſhe not receive her Kingdom, as a Bounty from the Hand of the Firſt Cæſar, and afterwards Rebel againſt his Adopted Son and Succeſſor? What was it but Cleopatra's Charms and Philtres that debauch'd Anthony, and made him a Traytor both to his Country and to his Friends? Some Princes ſhe dethron'd; Others again ſhe made the Paſſive Inſtruments of her Iniquity.

To paſs now from her Ingratitude, Lewdneſs, Inhumanity, and Avarice, to That Infamous Meanneſs of Spirit that ſhe ſhew'd at the Naval Battle of Actium, where ſhe abandon'd even her Belov'd Anthony himſelf; and the Father of many Children by her; and her forcing him to deliver up his Army, and his Honour, and all This to follow her. Could any thing be Meaner, or more Contemptible! In fine, upon Cæſar's taking Alexandria, ſhe was tranſported to ſuch a Degree of Rage, that ſhe valu'd her ſelf upon the Merit of a Mercileſs Barbarity: inſomuch that it would have made ſome Amends for the Loſs of the Town if ſhe could but have put all the Jews that were in it, to death with her Own Hand. Now if it be again, as Apion reports, that Cleopatra refus'd Corn to the Jews in a Time of Famine, Why does he charge That upon Us as a Diſgrace, which in Effect redounds to our Honour. But Cleopatra receivd the Juſt Reward of her Evil Doings. And Phyſcon makes War upon Cleopatra, and Onias Engages in her Defence.

* This part of the Greek Copy is Loſt, and the Vacancy Supply'd out of the Latin.

A Miraculous Providence in Favour of the Jews.

Envy and Detraction all over.

The Jews Appeal to Cæsar Himself in Justification of Their Loyalty.

And what can we do better now for our Own Justification, than to appeal to Cæsar Himself; The Publick Decrees of the Senate of Rome, and the Testimonials of Augustus Cæsar; which will all bear us Witness of the Faith and True Allegiance we have ever paid to the Empire; and particularly in the War against the Ægyptians.

Now these are the Pieces and the Authorities that Apion should have Consulted, if he would have done Us Right. He should have Examin'd what Opinion Alexander Himself and other Great Princes had of Us; All the Ptolemies; the Senate; and so to the most Illustrious of the Roman Emperours. If Germanicus could not supply all the Alexandrians with Corn, that wanted it; This was no Fault of the Jews, but the Infelicity of a Barren Season, or a Hard Year. For no Body ever doubted the Good Affection of the Emperours toward the Alexandrian Jews: neither were they deny'd Wheat any more than their Neighbours. But, on the contrary, they found Credit upon all Occasions; as in the Command of the River, and other considerable Passes: and they were trusted, in fine, in All Places and Matters of Moment beyond Other People.

Apion's Objections Answer'd.

But then says Apion, If the Jews be Citizens of Alexandria, how comes it that they do not Worship the same Gods, and Embrace the same Religion with the rest of their Fellow-Citizens? Now to answer you in your Own Way; How come You that are all Ægyptians, to Clash and Squabble one with another about Diversity of Opinions in the Matter of Worship? Shall we pronounce You presently to be no Ægyptians for This? Or shall we doubt, on the other hand, whether you are, in Truth, Men or No: for taking so much pains to breed up Beasts, even Contrary to Nature, and then for Worshipping them when you have done? Whereas Our People live in Union and Agreement. Now if You Your selves are so divided among Your selves, what Wonder is it if the Alexandrian Jews, that came thither from Abroad, stick to their Old Laws still, how differing soever from Yours?

Apion Imputes all the State-Factions to the Divisions among the Jews.

But Apion will have it again, that all the Broyls and Commotions in the State there, were long of These Disagreements in Matters of Religion betwixt the Alexandrian Jews and Ancient Inhabitants. Now if this Imputation holds good against the Alexandrian Jews, why not as well against all Other Jews Elsewhere too? For wheresoever we are dispers'd, We are nevertheless all of a piece. So that he that looks narrowly into These Turbulent Revolutions, will find them to be only such as Apion Himself, that were the Occasion of them: for so long as the Greeks and Macedonians were in This City, the Jews had the Free Exercise of their Religion, and the People liv'd all Quietly and Happily together. But as the Ægyptians more and more encreas'd, so the Times in proportion grew more and more Troublesome. But the Jews all this time continu'd the same, throughout all Changes; while the Other, having neither the Constancy of the Macedonians, nor the Prudence of the Greeks, stirr'd up all these Broyls: and being, over and above Poison'd with the Ill Habits and Practices of the Ægyptians, and irritated by the Aversion they had for the Jews. These were the People, I say, that gave the Rise to all our Confusions: So that we are only charg'd for the Errours and Miscarriages of our very Accusers. Apion is likewise pleas'd to Vilify Us as Strangers, though qualify'd to all Purposes with the Rights of Freemen, and yet our Adversaries at the same time set up for Citizens, without the least Colour of a Pretence or Title to That Privilege. We do not read that any Prince in the History of Former Times; or that any of the Late Emperours ever granted Letters of Freedom to the Ægyptians. But the First that introduc'd Us to a Right to That Claim, was Alexander the Great, and the Grant hath been since Enlarged with Additions by Other Kings, and since That again, Continu'd and Confirm'd to Us by the Romans.

Joseph turns them upon Apion and his Party.

The Jews Vilify'd by Apion; and Vindicated by Joseph.

The Case of Graven Images.

Apion takes Occasion to lay Great Blame upon Us also, for not setting up Images and Statues in Honour of the Emperours; as if They could not have taken notice of This Themselves, without His Intermeddling on Their Behalf. Now instead of Arraigning Us, he should rather have Celebrated the Generous Courtesie of the Romans, in allowing their Subjects the Freedom of their Own Religion, without Extorting from them such Honours as they could not Pay them with a good Conscience. So that they contented themselves with Those Respects, which might be Honestly render'd them. It is the Good Will that stamps the Obligation, and sets a Value upon the Benefit, without the Intervention either of Necessity, or of Violence. Well! But it is a Common Practice, You'll say, both with the Greeks and Other Nations, to set a High Esteem upon the Pictures or Images of their Fathers, Mothers, Children: nay, and of Strangers sometimes, and so to their very Servants, &c. And shall Men grudge a Deference of the same Kind and Quality to their Lords and Masters? My Answer is, that Ours is a quite Different Case, with a respect to Our Venerable Law-giver; who hath positively forbidden us the Use of all Images, and of any Creature whatsoever, either Animate, or Inanimate. And he did not This in any Prospect of Derogating from the Dignity of the Roman Empire: But he would not suffer any Corporeal Image, or Representation to be made of an Invisible and an Incomprehensible God. But we are not yet forbidden the Paying of a Reverence to Good Men, in the next place to God Himself: As in the Case of the Emperours and the People of Rome, for whose Welfare and Prosperity, we Offer Daily Sacrifices, at the Charge of the Publick, and for no other Mortals under the Sun.

This may serve for an Answer to Apion's Extravagancies about Alexandria; but not without Admiration at the Confidence of Posidonius and Apollonius Molon that furnish'd the Materials, and Charge us for not Worshipping the same Gods with Other People. To say nothing of a World of Scurrilous Stories upon That Subject, even to the degree of Blaspheming and Ridiculing our very Temple it self, and without any Check of Conscience for what they do. Not but that a Falsity of any sort is One of the most Unmanly of Vices; but especially where the Scandal of it falls upon a Holy Temple, so Famous all over the World for the Exemplary Solemnity of an Orderly Devotion.

A Senseless Tale of an Ass with a Golden Head.

In This Holy Place, says Apion, the Jews had the Golden Head of an Ass of very Great Value; which Head the Jews Worshipp'd, and it was a Deity answerable to their Religion, The Image, he says, was deposited in the Treasury, and There found, and so carry'd away by Antiochus Epiphanes, upon the Rifling of That Sacred Place. Now my Answer to Apion is This; that supposing the Story to have been a Truth, it would not yet look well out of the Mouth of an Ægyptian to reproach us with it; for an Ass is not one jot more Scandalous than a Goat, or a Weezle, or several Other Beasts that the Ægyptians Adore. How could any Man be so besotted now as to believe himself, in so Incredible an Imposture, with Twenty Gross Contradictions in the Face of him! Have we not still govern'd our selves from time to time by the same Laws and Customs, without ever Shifting, or Changing? And though Jerusalem hath born her part in the Common Fate of other Cities, and fall'n into the Hands of Enemies over and over, as Theos, Pompey the Great, Licinius Crassus, and of Titus Cæsar now at last, Temple and all. There was no Talk of an Asses Head found there, nor of any thing Extraordinary, but the Purest Piety, and the Ensigns of it, which will not be properly a Subject for This Place.

The Treachery and Sacrilege of Antiochus.

As for Antiochus; his Pillaging of the Temple was a Faithless and a Perfidious Action. He did not master it, as a Fair Enemy, but as a Treacherous Friend, and a Traytor to his Allies. He wanted Money; and Thus he supply'd his Necessities, like a Common Thief by Robbery: But in short, we have many grave Historians to bear Us Witness, that there was nothing found, as he pretends, upon the Rifling of it, to make the Party, or the Cause Ridiculous. As among Others, I may reckon Polybius the Megalopolitane, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas the Damascen, Timagenes, Castor the Chronologer, and Apollodorus: who do all agree, that Antiochus being very Necessitous, brake Faith with the Jews, and robb'd the Temple of a Prodigious Mass of Gold and Silver. Now if Apion had not had the Heart of an Ass and the Impudence of a Dog, Two of the Gods they Worshipp'd, he would have taken These Circumstances into Consideration. But we are not yet come to have That Veneration for our Asses, that the Ægyptians have for their Asps and Crocodiles, wherein they are so Superstitious, that whosoever is stung by the One, or snatch'd away by the Other; they reckon he goes immediately to the Gods. But Asses are to Us the very same thing they are to Other Wise Men. We make use of them to carry our Burdens, and to do our Drudgery: But if they spoil the Corn, or will not do as they should do, we Reclaim them by Blows.

Now after all This Spite and Calumny, Apion's Inventions have been either so ill laid, or so ill put together, that he could never get Credit enough in the World yet to do us any Hurt. But there is Another Malicious Story still behind, that passes all the rest; and he borrow'd it from the Greeks: We shall not need to say more of it than This; that they know little of what belongs to Piety, or Holy Things, who do not Understand, that the Prophaning of a Temple by walking thorough it, is a much more Pardonable Offence, than the Raising of Scandals against Religious Men, and Reflecting Indignities upon Those that serve at the Altar: But it was their Business rather to Palliate a Sacrilegious and a Perfidious Prince, by imputing what he did to his Necessities, than to do Right to Us, and our Temple.

A Phantastical Encounter between Antiochus and a Grecian.

Apion says further, That Antiochus, upon Entring the Temple, found a Man in Bed there, with a Table before him set out with all the Delicacies that either Sea or Land afforded. This Man was so surpriz'd at the Encounter, that looking upon Antiochus as his Good Angel, and One that came to Rescue him, he threw himself at his Feet; and in a Posture Posture of Adoration, implor'd his Assistance. The King bad him speak freely, and tell him what he was; how he came thither; what he did there; and finally what was the meaning of That Treat there upon the Table. The Poor Man, upon This, burst out presently into a Passion, and with Sighs and Tears gave him This Answer.

I am, says he, a Greek; and as I was wandring up and down This Country for a Livelyhood, I was taken up at Unawares by some Outlandish People; who brought me to This Place, and shut me up here; with Order not to let any Creature come at me. I was at first well enough pleas'd with an Entertainment so much beyond my Expectation: but upon Second Thoughts, finding my self a little Suspicious, and Uneasie, I sounded some of my Keepers to know what might be the meaning of This way of Proceeding; and the Resolution they gave me was This; That the Jews had a Law or Custom among Themselves once a Year, upon a Certain Day Prefix'd, to seize upon a Grecian Stranger: and so when they had kept him a-fat'ning for One whole Year, to take him out into a Wood, and Offer him up for a Sacrifice according to the Solemnity of their Own Forms: taking a Taste of his Blood, with a Horrid Oath at the same time, to live and die Mortal Enemies to the Greeks: After which, they cast the Remainder of this Miserable Carcass into a Ditch. The Greek told Antiochus likewise, that his Time was out within a few Days; adjuring him by the Veneration he had for the Grecian Gods, to deliver him from that Inhumane Treachery of the Jews.

This Tragical Invention was carry'd on to the Highest Pitch of Shameless Cruelty; but not so far yet, as to discharge Antiochus of the Sacrilege in any sort, as Those Parasites would have had it, that trumpt up This Story in His Favour. For it was not upon the Greeks account that Antiochus enter'd the Temple: but he found him There after he was in, without any Foreknowledge of the Matter; so that it was a Wickedness in his Heart not to be warranted upon any False Pretence Whatsoever, as will appear Manifestly from the Thing it self. Now the Difference is much Greater betwixt Our Laws and the Ægyptians, and those of several Other Nations, than betwixt Us and the Greeks, Or where is the Country, in fine, that has not People of all Religions some time or other to pass thorough it? And how comes it now at last, that This Phantastical Barbarity should be Exercis'd only upon the Greeks? Or how is it possible that the Jews should all joyn in the Solemnizing of These Sacrifices; and so many Thousands, as Apion Numbers them, have every one a Morsel out of the Carcass of one Miserable Wretch? And Then how comes it that we have not the Name of This Persecuted Greek, whoever he was; and that Antiochus did not send him back again in Pomp and State, into his Own Country; which would have given him the Reputation of a Prince of Piety, and a True Lover of his People: beside the making a Strong Party against the Power and Hatred of the Jews.

No Convincing of a Fool but by Demonstration.

But there's no working upon Fools by Argument, without the Demonstrative Evidence of Sense and Fact. Now there is not any Man that ever saw This Temple of Ours, but can Witness the Care that was taken by Inviolable Laws and Provisions, to order every Thing in Purity and Perfection. It was divided into Four Partitions, and a Guard appointed for Each of them apart. The First Division was Open to all Comers, Strangers and all, without any Reserve; only Women excepted in their Monthly Courses; Jews and their Wives (That is to say, Clean and Purify'd) were admitted into the Second, and Male Jews, purify'd in like manner, into the Third. The Fourth was only for the Priests in their Sacerdotal Habits: And none but the High-Priest in his Pontifical Robes peculiar to his Dignity, to enter the Holy Sanctuary: Nay, so Strict and Punctual were they in all the Niceties of Form and Decorum, that the very Priests Themselves could not have Admittance but at such Certain Hours.

A Description, and a Division of the Temple.

The Rules and Methods of the Jewish Worship and Discipline.

Upon the Opening of the Temple in the Morning, the Priests that were to Officiate, attended and enter'd; and so at Noon, upon the Shutting of it up again. There was in the Temple an Altar, a Table, a Censer and a Candlestick, according to the Direction of the Law; neither was it allow'd to carry into it any other Vessel. There was no Eating or Feasting, nor any thing at all done in Mystery, but in the Face of the Whole Congregation: And all things in such Method too, that though there were Four Tribes of Priests, and every Tribe upward of Five Thousand Persons, they took their Turns yet of Attendance upon their Set and Certain Days; and and so successively, as One went off, Another came on: and then about Noon meeting All together in the Temple, they deliver'd up their respective Trusts One to Another: Some discharging themselves of the Keys; Others of the Vessels, and without bringing any thing at all into That Holy Place that belongs to Meat or Drink: For it is not Lawful to Offer any thing upon our Altars, but what is provided for the Sacrifice. But what signifies all This Scribling now at a Venture, without any Consideration whether it be True or False; which is certainly the Foulest Thing can be be ſaid of any Man that ſets up for an Hiſtorian, or a Lover of Letters! Beſide that at the ſame time, when Apion publiſhes his ſpiteful Invectives againſt us, without any Foundation on the One Hand, he ſuppreſſes all the Good Things of us, that he certainly knows to be True, on the other. Now for the Fancy of his Greek Priſoner; his Luxurious Entertainment, and the People's paſſing through the Temple as a Thorough-Fare, where it is notoriouſly known that none but Prieſts durſt preſume to ſhew their Heads: This is all a Forgery, and a Contrivance of Prepenſe Malice, to ſeduce Thoſe that will not give themſelves the Trouble to Search-out the Truth. At This rate are we to be Juggled out of our Senſes, and out of our Credit.

A Ridiculous Fiction of one Zabidus.

Apion purſues the Humour ſtill with one Fable upon the Back of Another, to make us yet more and more Odious: and ſo furniſhes Another Foppiſh Story out of the Mouth of the Grecian, in Theſe Words. "While the Jews and the Idumæans, ſays "he, where Engaged in a Long and an Obſtinate War, there came a Man over to the "Jews out of ſome City or other of Idumæa, where they Worſhipp'd Apollo, and "This Man's Name was Zabidus; who promis'd them to put Apollo the God of the "Dorians into Their Hands, if they could but get the Jews to gather all together into "the Temple in a Body. Zabidus, upon This, contriv'd a Certain Machine of "Boards; and conveying himſelf into it, ſet up Three Rows of Lights upon it, "which appear'd at a diſtance like a Comet upon the Ground

"This Apparition was ſo Great a Surprize to the Jews, that they ſtood gazing at it a "far off, without ſo much as one Word ſpeaking. Zabidus, in the Mean while ſlipt "into the Temple; and without any Difficulty Seiz'd the Aſſe's Golden Head (as he plea-"ſantly renders it), and carry'd it away to Dora. The Sillineſs of This Invention ſpeaks Apion the Greater Aſs of the Two; together with an Incomparable Impudence, over and above the Folly of it; for there are no ſuch Places to be found as ſeveral that he mentions. He does not ſo much as know where Idumæa lies; or that there is no ſuch City in it as Dora. There is a Place indeed of That Name in Phœnicia, not far from Mount Carmel; but This is Four days Journey from Judæa: and None of Apion's Dora.

He is much in the Right ſure to Condemn us for not Worſhipping other People's Gods; if, as he ſays, our Forefathers were ſo Credulous as to believe that Apollo would come over to him, and that he look'd like a Walking Comet. It was a Wonder again that the Jews ſhould not know a Lamp or a Torch, when they ſaw it, from a Star, that had ſo many of their Own: and the Miracle was little Leſs, that Apollo ſhould go off Clear with his Aſs's-Head, thorough ſo many Thouſands of People, without ſo much as being queſtion'd above it: and no Guards to ſtop him, either in Town, or Country; and This in the Heat of the War too.

Here are more Words already about a Ridiculous Hiſtory than the Thing is worth: and yet I cannot but Wonder again, over and over, how the Temple-Gates of Sixty Cubits in Height, Twenty in Breadth, plated all over, and within a little of Maſſive Gold; Two Hundred Men every Day to ſhut them; and a Crime Unpardonable to leave them Open: ---- How Theſe Gates, I ſay, ſhould be menag'd by One ſingle Man; and Zabidus, according to the Story, to keep the Aſſe's Head to Himſelf. Wherefore it may be a Queſtion whether Zabidus brought the Head back again, or elſe gave it to Apion to be laid in the Temple on purpoſe for Antiochus to find it, and ſo to furniſh Matter for another Flam-Story.

Apion forgeth an Oath and chargeth it upon the Jews.

It is as Falſe again, what he ſays of the Oath: That is to ſay; that the Jews do ſolemnly Swear by the Maker of Heaven, Earth and the Seas; that they will never do Good to any Strangers; and above all others, not to the Greeks. Now if This Falſifier had ſaid, (Eſpecially not to the Ægyptians) he might better have Conſiſted with Himſelf, at leaſt if our Predeceſſors were driven out of Ægypt, not for their Ill Manners, but for their Misfortunes. As to the Jews and Greeks, they were at ſo Great a diſtance one from the Other, that there was not the Leaſt Colour for Envy, or Hatred, betwixt them. Nay, on the Contrary, they came ſeveral of them over to our Religion: Some perſiſted in it; Others went off again: But for This pretended Oath, Apion is the only Man that ever heard of it; and no otherwiſe neither, than as a Project of his own Contriving.

A Diſcourſe upon Governn ent and Subjection.

But the Next is an Admirable Crotchet. He brings it as an Argument againſt the Juſtice of our Laws, our Manner of Worſhip, and the Truth of our Religion, that we are under the Burden of Servitude and Oppreſſion; not only in our Perſons, but in our Capital City it Self: A City, that how Free and Powerful ſoever it hath been formerly, is at preſent no better than a Tributary to the Romans, and where are the People now that are Able to Contend with them? Or who but Apion would Reaſon the Caſe at This Foppiſh rate; as if Dominion were an Entail: Whereas Government and Subjection take their Fortunes in the World by Turns. Only the Ægyptians pretend pretend an Immunity from all Services to the Rulers of Asia and Europe; which they ground upon the Gratitude of the Strange Gods, that fled from Abroad into Their Country for Sanctuary, and There secur'd Themselves in the shape of Beasts. Was ever so senseless a Vanity as This heard of, from the Mouth of a sort of People who never Enjoy'd One Day of Liberty in an Age, either at Home, or Abroad? How often have the Persians had the Ægyptians at their Feet; razing their Cities; Ravaging their Temples; destroying their Idol-Deities, and Vilifying their Worship! But I am not for Writing after Apion's Copy, and turning a Misfortune into a Reproach. Where was there ever a Braver People than the Lacedæmonians; or a Nation of more Exemplary Piety than the Athenians? And yet neither the Virtue of the One, nor the Courage of the other was sufficient to secure them against the Chances of War, and the Common Fate of Kingdoms and States. To say nothing of the Miserable Disasters that have attended the Best of Kings; as Cræsus for One: the laying of the Tower of Athens, the Temples of Ephesus and Delphi, and several other Illustrious Places and Palaces, all in Ashes. Now the Scandal, in such Instances as These, falls in course upon the Actors of These Tragical Devastations, not upon the Sufferers of them; however our Accuser Apion, has found out a New way of Crimination, without so much as Dreaming how far Ægypt it self is Concern'd in the Parity of the Case. But he had the Fancy of Sesostris in his Head, and was so taken up with the Freak of his being King of Ægypt, that he knew not what he did. Now if we were given to be vain on the other hand, we might find Kings of our own to boast of; as David and Solomon, with the History of the Princes and Nations that were subdu'd by their Victorious Arms. But we shall rather keep to our Text. What were the Ægyptians, but first, Slaves to the Persians, with other Princes of Asia, and so to the Macedonians? While we all this while liv'd in a State of Freedom, with the Command of all the Neighbouring Cities for the Space of a Hundred and Twenty Years: That is to say, to the Time of Pompey the Great? And then at last, when the Romans had over-run all the other Kings they had to do withal, our Forefathers were the only People they treated like Friends and Allies for their Faith and Valour. But Apion it seems, knew nothing of all This, and makes himself a Stranger to Things as Clear as the Sun to all the World beside.

The Jews Misfortunes turn'd to their Reproach.

The Lacedæmonians and Athenians, Brave, but Unfortunate.

No Fence against the Chances of War.

The Jews the Only Favourites of the Romans.

Apion has now another Blow at us, for an Obscure Ignorant sort of People. "The "Jews, he says, have no Famous Men among them for Arts and Sciences, or for the "Political Wisdom of menaging Governments and States: Such I mean, as Socrates, "Zeno, Cleanthes, and the like. Nay, he does not forget himself neither in the List of his Famous Men; but Blesses Alexandria in the Honour of having Apion for a Citizen. As to This Character of Apion, All People have so Mean an Opinion of him for the Extravagant Corruption of his Life and Manners, that it would never have been believ'd, but from his Own Mouth: So that Alexandria is rather to be Pity'd than Envy'd for Valuing it self upon such a Supporter. As to the Point in Competition betwixt the Two Nations, which of them should have the Preference for Men of Art and Learning, the Reader has no more to do, but to Consult our Antiquities for his Satisfaction. And then for That part of the Scandal that remains Unanswer'd, We cannot do better than to refer him to his Own Contradictions, wherein he accuses Himself and other Ægyptians.

The Calumnies of Apion laid open.

His Vanity and Self-Conceit.

He takes Great Offence at our Sacrificing Ordinary Beasts; the Scruple we make at the Eating of Swine's Flesh: And then for the Ceremony of our Circumcision, he makes a downright Mock of it. As to our killing of Beasts, it is no more than what all the World does as well as We: And then for our Sacrifices, he discovers himself before he's aware, to be an Ægyptian, by speaking against them; for a Greek or a Macedonian, that makes Profession of Offering Whole Hecatombs to the Gods Themselves without any Difficulty, would never have stumbled upon That Block. They share also with their Priests in the Flesh of their Oblations, and no danger all this While of destroying the Species of Those Animals, as Apion seems to apprehend: Whereas if all Other People were of the Ægyptians Humour, the World would come quickly rather to Want Men, and a Stock of Ravenous Wild Beasts to fill Their Places: For Those are the Gods they train up and Worship.

If the Question were now put to Apion, what sort of Ægyptians he takes to be the Holiest and the Wisest Men; His Answer undoubtedly would be the Priests: For they have These Two Precepts transmitted down to them in a Tradition from their First Kings, i. e. To Worship the Gods, and to apply themselves to the Study of Wisdom. And This they all make Profession to do: They are all of them Circumcis'd, over and above; forbear Swine's Flesh, and joyn with no Other sort of Ægyptians in their Sacrifices. So that Apion did Wonderfully mistake his Measures, when, instead of Gratifying the Ægyptians with Invectives against Us, he advanced a Direct Accusation against againſt Thoſe he pretended to favour; in Charging the Same Ceremonies upon Them, that he blames Us for: And likewiſe Adviſing and Encouraging Circumciſion in Others, as we have it upon the Credit of Herodotus. It ſeems to Me now that Apion's Puniſhment (as it follows here) was very Juſt upon him, for ſpeaking ſuch Bitter Things againſt the Laws of his Countrey. He was forced, by Advice, upon a Circumciſion: The Wound Putrify'd, and the Part Cancerating upon it, the Diſtemper carry'd him off in Miſerable Torments. This may ſerve for a Warning to Thoſe that, like Apion, abandon all the Rules and Duties of Life and Good Manners Themſelves, and then Employ their Wits in the defaming of their Neighbours. This was Apion's Caſe. He Apoſtatiz'd from the Laws of his Own Countrey, and he bely'd Ours. We are now come to the End of Apion's Life; and it is time to put an End to This Book too.

The miſerable Death of Apion.

But ſince ſo it is that Apollonius Molon, Lyſimachus and Several Others have caſt out ſome Words, like Fools, or Madmen, to the Diſhonour of Moſes, our Excellent Law-giver; aſperſing him for an Impoſtor and a Magician, and repreſenting his Laws as Peſtilent and Dangerous, it will not be Amiſs to give the World ſome ſhort account, as well Particular as General, of our Converſation and Government: And I doubt not but to make it appear that there was never ſuch a Body of Laws fram'd for the Common Good of Mankind, as Theſe of Moſes; either for the Advancing of Piety, Juſtice, Charity, Induſtry, the Regulation of Humane Society, Reſignation, and Patience, to the very Contempt of Death it ſelf: Never the like, I ſay, if People would but Impartially conſider them: for I am not here upon a Panegyrick to the Honour of our Anceſtors, but doing a Neceſſary Right to the Cauſe, againſt Calumny and Subornation.

Moſes defended againſt Apollonius and Others.

The Excellency of Moſes's Laws.

Now Apollonius does not Carry on his Malice like Apion, in a Continu'd Set Diſcourſe; but now and then by Snaps as the Humour takes him: One while he makes Atheiſts of us, and a Hateful ſort of People both to God and Man. In One Fit he will have us to be Cowards; and then Our Fault is at the Next Word that We are too forward, and Fool-hardy, and Arranter Sots than the moſt Stupid of Barbarians; for the Jews never invented any thing (he ſays) that Mankind was the Better for. Now there needs no more to the Confuting of Theſe Spiteful Suggeſtions, than to Examine the Conſtitution of the Laws by which we are Govern'd, and the Strict Conformity of our Lives and Practices to Thoſe Precepts. But now if we ſhall be forc'd in our Own Juſtification to rip up the Imperfections of Other Polities, they may thank Themſelves for provoking us to it by an Opprobrious Compariſon, and making the Reproach we caſt upon Them, Neceſſary to our Own Defence.

Apollonius his Way of Defaming the Jews.

Two Main Points in the Caſe.

There are, in ſhort, but Two Points in the Caſe. Firſt; Are the Laws we pretend to, Good, and Profitable, or Not? Secondly; Are we Strict Obſervers, or Not, of our Own Laws? If they ſhould deny the Former, we are ready to make it out from an Undeniable Abſtract of the very Laws Themſelves. And then the Second Part is ſo Clear, that it will not bear ſo much as a Queſtion. But to carry it a little further yet. It is without Diſpute, that the Firſt Founders of Laws for the Eſtabliſhment of Order and Diſcipline, out of a Good will to the Publick, are to be Preferr'd infinitely before Thoſe that live without any Rule or Method at all; for They All Appeal to Antiquity, and take it for a Greater Honour to Teach Others what they ought to do, then barely to imitate what they ſee done before them. Now This being given for Granted; It is the Law-givers, Part in the firſt place, to make ſuch a Proviſion of Laws, as may ſerve to promote the Good of the Community, by the very Convenience and Reaſon of them; While the People, on the Other ſide, ſtand Firm to the Eſtabliſhment, in Deſpite of all Tryals and Temptations.

Moſes undoubtedly the firſt Law-giver.

Homer himſelf wanted a Word for a Law.

As to the Antiquity of our Law-giver, he has undoubtedly a Right to a Precedence before all Others: For Lycurgus, Solon, and Zaleucus of Locris, with the reſt of the Eminent Greeks, they ſo much boaſt of, were all but Novices, and Upſtarts, Compar'd with Moſes. The very Name of Law was not as yet ſo much as heard of, and Homer Himſelf wanted a Word for it. The People in Thoſe Days were not govern'd by Written Precepts, but by the Abſolute Will and Pleaſure of Kings; and ſo it held a long time by Authoritative Orders and Proviſions to anſwer the Occaſion. But our Law-giver having his Claim of Priority granted him by his very Enemies, acquitted himſelf likewiſe to Admiration, in all the Offices of Adminiſtration and Council. Firſt, in Compoſing ſuch a Body of Laws as might anſwer all the Neceſſities of Humane Life: And after That, in getting them receiv'd among the People, with a Declaration that they would Maintain and Obey them. But we ſhall the better judge of the Man by his Works.

The Hiſtory of Moſes.

When our Fore-fathers, to the Number of many Thouſands, March'd out of the Land of Ægypt into the Countrey that God had appointed for them, thorough a Barren ren Sandy Desart, without Water; and several Encounters with the Enemy by the Way, in Defence of Themselves, their Wives and their Children: Who was their Guide all This while to carry them off through These almost Insuperable Difficulties, but our Careful Law-giver still, in the Quality, both of a Valiant General, a Wise Councellour, and their Common Protector! A Person of so Exemplary a Modesty, that tho' the People were Every Man of them at his Command, to do what he would with them, he never took upon Himself to Act any thing by his Own Power: But in Cases where Other Men pretended to Tyrannize and Domineer, and to indulge a General Licence, and Debauch; Moses, on the Contrary, walk'd in the Fear of God, and by his Example encourag'd the People in the Exercise of Piety and Justice, as their Best Security, together with the Improvement of all Accidents.

Moses was the Peoples Guide, and God Himself was Moses's.

Moses was much in the Right to look upon God as his Oracle, and Adviser: And then being Satisfy'd in Himself that he could not do amiss, so long as he Committed himself to the Conduct of Divine Providence, he did his Uttermost to possess the Common People also with the same Thing: For nothing puts such a Check upon us in all our Iniquities, as to Consider that God sees us: So that, in fine, our Law-giver was not a Seducer, or a Magician, as he is falsely represented; but such Another, as Minos, and Others after Him were reputed among the Greeks: Some ascribing the Original of their Laws to Jupiter; Others, to Apollo, or the Oracle at Delphi; but whether These Men believed This Themselves, or only gave it out to have the People believe it, May be a Question: But we shall best judge of the Excellency, and Sacredness of These Laws by Comparing them; Which is the Next Thing we are to do.

The Original of the Grecian Laws.

Several Nations have their several Forms of Government, and their Diversities of Laws. Some Governments are committed to a single Person; Others to the People: But Our Law-giver was neither for the One, nor for the Other; but betwixt Both, for That which he calls a Holy Common-wealth; assigning God Himself for the Head of it, with a respect both to Worship and Power, as the Fountain and the Author of all Good. To Him it is that we fly for Succour in our Distresses, who hears our Prayers, and searches the very Secrets of our Hearts. He inculcates to us the Doctrine of One God; One Uncreated, Unchangeable, and Eternal Being; infinitely Glorious, and Incomprehensible, any further than what we know of him by his Works. Now This is no more than what we have in a Great Measure from the Wiser sort of the Greek Philosophers Themselves; even by the Light of Nature, for they do All Unanimously agree upon the Congruity of These Principles to the Majesty and Excellence of God: As there's Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Plato; and after Them, the Stoicks, who are almost Wholly of the same Mind as to This Subject. But the Multitude being Engag'd in a Violent and a Superstitious Prepossession against These Opinions, the Philosophers durst not venture too far in the Promoting of them. But Our Law-giver was the only Man that liv'd as he taught; both to the Satisfaction of the Present Age, and to the Establishing and Confirming of Posterity in the Truths that he deliver'd: Governing Himself also by This Constant Rule, that he made the Publick Good the End still of all his Laws. He gave to Understand, that God's Worship was but one Part of a Holy Man's Duty, and so Cast in the Other Branches of it, as Fortitude, Justice, and a constant Interchange of Good Offices toward Mankind, over and above: Insomuch that All his Precepts and Prescriptions terminated in the Advancement of Piety, to the Honour and Glory of God: This being a Point that he had thoroughly study'd and Examin'd.

Several Forms of Government.

Moses's Holy Common-wealth.

What Thoughts the Greek Philosophers had of a Deity, by the Light of Nature.

The Difference betwixt Moses and Other Law-givers.

As to what concerns Religion, and Good Manners, it was his way to joyn the Theory with the Practice; whereas Other Law-givers commonly took One part of the Division, and left the Other. As for Example. The People of Lacedæmon, and Crete, were nevertheless instructed in Morals, tho' not by Rule and Precept: But the Athenians, and well nigh all the Other Greeks, had their Laws for Every thing, tho' they fell short in the Practice. Whereas Our Law-giver provided for Both in One; attending, at the same time, the Cultivating and the Perfecting of our Morals, with the Adapting of proper Provisions in Writing to answer all Occasions. He begins upon the Subject of Meats and Diet; What we may be allow'd to Eat, and What Not, and with whom; and reducing all People indifferently to the Order of That Method. He takes the same Care also for a Regulation in the Matter of Labour and Rest, to the End that no Man may be Ignorant of his Duty: for what the Law bids us to do, is the Dictate and Command of our Master, and it punishes only Willful Offenders. But to leave us wholly without Excuse now, in case of Transgressing any of These Holy Laws; it is not enough to hear them read over and over; (once, 'twice, or Oft'ner perhaps) but we are positively Commanded (all Other Work or Business apart) to meet constantly once a Week in a Full Congregation, Expresly to attend the Reading of the Law, and the getting of it by Heart; which was never

Of Morality and Religion. The Jews are all Train'd up to the same Laws and Government.

They keep one Day of the Week Holy according to the Law.

Practis'd by any Other Law-givers! Nay ſo far are the Generality of the World from living in a Conformity to their Own Laws, that they do not ſo much as Underſtand what they are: But upon committing a Fault, they are fain to ask Other People what Law they have broken. This is, in Short, the very Caſe even amongſt Men of the Firſt Quality too; who are not aſham'd, tacitly to confeſs their Ignorance; in the taking of Men Learned in the Law to their Counſel and Aſſiſtance: Whereas Our People have the Laws at their Fingers Ends, as ready as their Own Names; having been train'd up to them from their very Cradle, till they are imprinted in their Hearts: and This makes Men the more Wary of Offending, when they find themſelves ſure to be detected, and Puniſh'd.

A Wonderful Agreement in Life and Manners.

This is the Foundation now of That Admirable Agreement we find among our ſelves. We have all of us the ſame Thoughts of God; the ſame Forms of Diſcipline and Worſhip; Our Way of Life and Manners, the very ſame too. It is not with Us, as it is with Other People that entertain Various Opinions of One and the ſame God: And Thoſe, not only the Common ſort of Men, that talk at random, and bolt out whatever comes next; but the Philoſophers Themſelves: Some of them deny the very Divinity of God; Others, his Providence, upon an Impious Suggeſtion, that All Men are Equal, and that All Things are in Common. Now we ſay, on the Contrary, that God ſees and diſpoſes of all Things. Nay our very Wives and Children are of the ſame Perſuaſion; and that All the Actions of our Lives ought to be directed to the Honour and Service of God.

To ſpeak now to That Reflection upon us, as Men of No Induſtry or Invention, either in Arts or Letters, for keeping ſtill (as they ſay) to the Dull plodding Train of the ſame over and over again: Whereas Men of Wit and Spirit value themſelves rather upon making Old Things look New, and refining upon the Wiſdom and Cuſtoms of their Fore-fathers. Now for our Parts, we make it a Point of Conſcience not to depart, either in Word, Thought, or Deed, from the Eſtabliſhments of Former Times: the very Antiquity it ſelf being an Infallible Mark of a Good and a Well-grounded Law, which neither Time, nor Argument, will be ever able to Deſtroy. But for Us now that firmly believe Theſe Laws of Ours to be of Divine Inſtitution, we have nothing more to do than to preſerve them Sacred, and Inviolate. For who ſhall dare to Offer at the Removing of Thoſe Foundations which God Himſelf hath laid? Or but to think of mending them; tho' by transfering the moſt Beneficial Proviſions out of the Beſt of Other Governments, to the Service of our Common-wealth? Can any Conſtitution be more Agreeable, Firm, or Juſt, than That whereof the King of Kings hath Vouchſafed to be the Author. As to the Prieſts, they are qualify'd in common for ſeveral Special Services, and the High-Prieſt in an Order of Power and Superiority above all the reſt. And they are not promoted by the Law-giver to That Dignity, for Ambition, Wealth, or any Corrupt Intereſt, but for the Signal Teſtimony they have given of their Piety, Temperance and Wiſdom; and to Them is committed the Care of Religion, and God's Holy Worſhip. They ſerve alſo as Judges in Controverſies betwixt Man and Man, with a Power to Puniſh Thoſe that do Amiſs. What Government now, or What Form of Government can be more Sacred or Venerable than This; or What Greater Honour can we do to Almighty God, than to ſpend our Lives in a Daily Attendance upon his Service; and under the Inſpection of the Prieſts, to ſee that All Things be done with Order and Reverence. The Solemnity of This Devotion makes Every Day look like a Feſtival. And whereas Other People have much ado to hold out, tho' but for ſome few days, in the Continu'd Celebration of their Myſteries, or Sacrifices, as They call them, We are yet as Firm, Chearful and Vigorous in the Diſcharge of our Duties at This Hour, as we were ſo many Ages ſince, upon the very Firſt Inſtitution of them.

Antiquities Sacred and of Divine Authority.

Qualifications for the Prieſthood.

Among Other known Precepts of our Religion, we are taught in the Firſt place, that God is All in All; Perfect, Happy, and Self-ſufficient: The Beginning, the Middle, and the End of All Things; Glorious in All his Actions and Works; Nothing ſo Manifeſt as his Power and Greatneſs, or at the ſame time ſo Incomprehenſible. It is not for the Tongue of Man to Expreſs, or for the Heart of Man ſo much as to Conceive any Reſemblance of That Divine Majeſty. He is, in fine, Incomparable in all his Excellencies, and Attributes, infinitely beyond Art or Imitation: So that it is Impoſſible to ſee, or to Imagine any thing like him; for being a Spirit, he is alſo Inviſible. But we are allow'd to read him however in his Works; as in the Light, the Heavens; the Earth, the Sun, the Moon, the Rivers, the Sea; Several ſorts of Animals; Various Plants, &c. Which were all the Work of God, and Created without either Labour, or Hands, or any ſecond to his Aſſiſtance: But his Will, and his Word gave them their Being. He made Every Thing by the Word of his Power; and in the ſame Inſtant looking upon it, he pronounc'd it to be good. This is the Almighty ty Sovereign that we are all bound to Love and Adore, in the Study and Exercise of Virtue, which is the Only way to please him.

Of God and his Works.

One God, One World, and One Temple. As there is but One God, and One World, in Common to All Mankind, it holds in the Analogy that there should be but One Temple too: For God takes delight in the Congruities of Order and Proportion. In This Temple, the Priests Offer up their Daily Devotions. The First in Quality, is the First that Sacrifices. He takes Care that the Laws be duly Observ'd; Hears Causes, and punishes Those that the Law Condemns: And it is in Effect as Penal to dispute the Authority of the Priest, as to appeal from the Judgment of God Himself. The Office and Authority of the Priests.

An Abstract of Moses's Laws and Precepts. The Sacrificers are to be Temperate, and Sober. In Eating the Flesh of our Sacrifices, we must have a Care not to Extend That Liberty, to the degree of Gluttony and Excess: For God that is a Lover of Sobriety, and all Manner of Temperance, can never be pleas'd with the Extravagancies of Violence and Profusion.

The Priest begins his Office with Prayers for the General Good of Mankind; and after That, Every Man for Himself, as a Part of the Whole; being well assured that Nothing is so Acceptable in the Sight of God, as a Mutual Charity and Tenderness among Men, one for another.

What to Pray for. When we Offer up our Prayers and Vows to Almighty God, we are not to Petition for Wealth, Honour, and the Good Things of This World; for These are Blessings, which he is pleased to bestow in Common upon Mankind; But Our Prayer must be for the Grace to make a Right Use of what we have.

Of Purifications. The Law hath also prescrib'd us Certain Formal Purifications, in the Case of Women; and under Other sorts of Limitation and Restriction; too Many and too Tedious for This place. This is what the Law says of God, and of the Ways of Pleasing him, and He Himself all this while is Effectually That very Law.

Of Marriages. But now to the Point of Marriage. If it be purely for the sake of Children without any By-regard to the Fortune, and not to Gratify any Loose Appetite: If there be no Force or Fraud in the Case, and provided it be done with the Consent of Parents; Our Laws approve of it. But as for the Sin of Unnatural Lusts, the very Attempt is punish'd with Death.

The Wife to be Subject to her Husband. The Law says further that the Woman shall be Subject in All Things to her Husband; which must not be taken for a Dispensation to Abuse her under That Cover, but as a Provision for the Upholding of Decency and Good Order: For God hath given the Man Power over his Wife. The Woman is to have no Carnal Knowledge of any Other Man, upon Pain of Death without Mercy: And he that abuses a Betrothed Virgin, incurs the same Penalty. It is the same Thing also in Case of Corrupting a Marry'd Woman or a Mother of Children. This is All according to our Law, which is likewise no less Severe upon Those Women that do either Conceal their Children when they are brought into the World, or otherwise Destroy them. For the Soul suffers with the Body; beside that it is in Some Degree an Unpeopling of the World. Whoever accompanies with a Woman, is look'd upon by our Law to be Unclean; and the Woman also is Obliged to Wash and Purify her self after That Congress with her Husband: To which End, there is Purifying Water still at hand for such an Occasion. So near is the Communication in This Case betwixt Soul and Body. Penalties in Cases of Incontinence. Corporal Purifications.

As to the Custom of Feasting, or Merry-making at the Birth of Children, This Law doth not upon any Terms approve of it; partly, to train them up to Sobriety betimes, and in part, for fear it might prove a Temptation to Intemperance, and Debauch. It is also provided that Children should be brought up to the Knowledge of Letters, both in Law, and History; for an Encouragement to them on the One Hand, to do Great Things in Imitation of Great Examples, and to Fortify them on the Other side, in a Perfect Understanding of their Duty.

Care taken to Moderate the Pomp of Funerals. There was Care taken also for Moderating the Vain Pomp and Expence of Burials, in Monuments, and Funeral Solemnities. But yet for the Decency of an Office so Humane and Necessary, it was Committed to the Domesticks to see Right done to the Memory of their Masters; and All People were permitted upon the Death of any Man, to come in, and Lament, and Condole over the Deceased; but the House was still to be Purify'd so soon as the Funeral was Over, and the Family to keep at a distance as Men reputed Unclean.

Neither is the Law Silent in Cases either of Will-ful Murder, or of Chance-Medley; but it directs a distinguishing Punishment according to the Quality of the Crime.

The Duty of Children to Parents and of the Younger to the Elder. Of Friendship. We are enjoyned Reverence to Parents next to the Veneration we pay to God Himself: And the Law appoints the Ungrateful and the Disobedient to be Ston'd to Death. The Younger sort are commanded to pay a Respect to their Elders; for God was before All Things. There must be no such Thing as a Secret among Friends, for Friendſhip implies an Entire Confidence without any Reſerve. Nay, where a Friendſhip is diſſolv'd, we muſt not yet be Falſe to a Former Truſt.

Severe Laws againſt Bribes, Fraud, Extorſion, &c.

The Judge that takes a Bribe is to be puniſh'd with Death, for ſiding with the Guilty, and Oppreſſing the Righteous. Every Man is reſtrain'd from touching any thing wrongfully of his Neighbours, from taking away what does not belong to him, or lending his Money upon Uſury: And ſo let This Suffice as to the Regulation of our Dealings one with another.

How to Treat Strangers.

It will be worth our While in the Next place to ſee how we are to behave our Selves toward Strangers, and to ſhew that our Law-giver hath been Wanting in nothing toward the Advancing of the Publick Good: Either by keeping us Firm to our Own Laws, or by Communicating the Benefit of them to Others that have a mind to partake of them. For he receives with Open Arms all that come over to us, of what Nation ſoever, indifferently; provided they agree in the ſame Common Principles of Life and Manners. But for Thoſe that come to us only as by the Bye; and without any Intent to joyn with us: Thoſe People are not ſuffer'd to Inter-mix with us in our Solemnities. But we are Obliged however to do them the Beſt Offices we can to All other Purpoſes. As for Example: If they ſhould want Fire, Water, Food, or the like; we are Commanded to ſupply them, or to ſet any of them Right that are out of their Way: And ſo to give a Dead Body a Decent Burial. Now Theſe are all Duties of Humanity abſtracted from Religion.

How to Behave our Selves towards our Enemies.

He preſcribes Rules of Moderation alſo to be Obſerv'd toward their Enemies without forcing War to the Extremities of Fire and Sword. Nay our Law-giver's Charity Extends to the very Eaſing of Priſoners, Women Eſpecially; and ſo for the Dead Bodies that fell in Battle, he would not ſuffer Them to be Stript.

Duties of Humanity Apart from thoſe of Religion.

Such, in fine, was the Paſſion he had for the Encouraging of Tenderneſs and Good Nature among Men, that he recommended the Practice of it, even towards Unreaſonable Creatures, in allowing us no Other Power over them, than for the Lawful and the Neceſſary Uſe and Service of Mankind. As for Domeſtick Creatures that are brought up Tame in our Houſes, they are to be ſpar'd: Neither in Other Caſes are the Dam and the Young to be deſtroy'd together. Beaſts of Labour and Common Uſe are likewiſe to be forborn, tho' in ſome reſpects Miſchievous.

Theſe were the Conſtitutions and Proviſions of our Law-giver upon This Topick; both for the promoting of Tender Inclinations by Inſtructive Doctrines, (as aforeſaid) upon That Subject, and likewiſe for the deterring of Tranſgreſſors by an Exemplary and an Inexorable Rigour. For the Puniſhment in many Caſes is no Leſs than Death; for Inſtance, in Adultery, Rape, and Unnatural Practices, as well in the Agent as in the Patient, and the penalty reaches all Conditions too, whether Bond or Free.

Duties of Common Juſtice betwixt Man, and Man.

We have our Laws alſo Concerning Weights and Meaſures; and All ſorts of Frauds in buying or ſelling; taking away Another Man's Goods, or appropriating to our ſelves what is not Our own. Now Offenders of This kind, are Puniſh'd with much more Severity, under Our Laws, than Elſewhere.

The Reward of well doing.

He that Blaſphemes God, or but attempts any thing of Indignity upon his Divine Majeſty: And He that behaves himſelf Contumaciouſly toward his Father and his Mother; They are all Doom'd to Death upon the Place. But what is the Reward at laſt that theſe People pretend to for what they do, and ſuffer, in the Obſervance of Theſe Laws. Not Gold and Silver; Imperial Crowns, and Precious Stones, but the Comfort and Teſtimony of a good Conſcience, with an Aſſurance of Eternal Happineſs: An Aſſurance grounded not only upon the Predictions of the Law-giver, but upon the Promiſe alſo of the God of Truth to Thoſe that keep his Laws. And in This Truſt and Confidence, they look upon Death it ſelf only as the Bleſſed Means of Tranſporting them from This Life to a Better.

The Jews Firm in all Extremities.

I ſhould have made a Conſcience of ſaying Thus much, if the Matter of Fact were not as Clear as the Sun, in the Hiſtory of our Fore-fathers: What Torments they have undergone, and with what Reſolution they have born them, rather than let fall one Word to the Diſhonour of their Profeſſion. But let us make it the Caſe now that the Jews were a People never ſo much as heard of upon the Face of the Earth, and no Witneſſes to the Veneration we have Conſtantly paid to our Laws. What would the Grecians think of it, if any body ſhould but tell them a Story of what they had heard, or read, of a People in ſome Imaginary unknown Land, that had ſtood True and Firm for ſo many Ages to the Religion, Laws and Cuſtoms of their Predeceſſors? Would they not All Wonder at it; Eſpecially Thoſe that are ſo Fickle and Changeable Themſelves?

As for their Modern Writers that treat of State and Government, How are they ridicul'd for their Impracticable Stories? To ſay nothing of ſeveral Other Philoſophers, that that have handled the same Subject: There is Plato Himself, the very Oracle of the Greeks, and a Man in Singular Esteem for his Wisdom, Piety and Manners; and a Philosopher of the First rate over and above. How is This Great Man, banter'd and buffoon'd upon a Publick Threatre, by some Self-Conceited Pretenders, for his Wild Notions of Government, as they call them! When yet upon a Strict Examination of his Writings, they will be found Agreeable both to Reason and Nature. But to take him upon his Own Confession; "It is not safe (he says) for a Wise Man, to tell "what he thinks of God, for fear of the Impetuous Ignorance of the Common Peo- "ple. But Plato (they say) writes like a Man of Vanity and Licence: Lycurgus indeed was a Man Celebrated for a Law-giver in Perfection, out of a Reverence they had to the Duration of his Laws under the same Administration. Now if so it be, that Laws, the Older they are, the Better they are, with what Face shall the Lacedæmonians set up for Competitors with Us, in the Point of Antiquity, who have been now upward of Two Thousand Years in Possession of our Claim! To which I must add This over and above, that the Lacedæmonians kept up their Laws to the Height, no longer, than while they were Free and Easy Themselves: But so soon as Fortune abandon'd Them, They fell off, and abandon'd their Laws.

Lycurgus Famous for the Reputation and Continuance of his Laws.

But for Our Parts, after all the Broils and Changes in Asia, and Our selves brought to the Last Extremity, it cannot be said that we ever departed from the Customs and Ceremonies of our Fore-fathers: Neither can it be Objected against us, that we ever Consulted, either our Ease, or our Pleasure, in persevering as we did. For whoever Compares the Condition of Both Parties, will find the Jews to have been upon much harder Duty than the Lacedæmonians. For they were put to no Offices of Drudgery, in digging and delving, or to any Other Handicraft-Labour; but liv'd in the City, at their Ease, Fat and Fair, and all manner of Necessaries provided them to their Hand: So that they had nothing more to do, but now and then upon Occasion, to Encounter the Publick Enemy. And what if I should say now that they fail'd in That too? For they went over in Frequent Desertions, not only here and there One, but in whole Troops together sometimes; Who, contrary to Law and Duty, and the Common Obligation of Citizens and Soldiers, deliver'd themselves up with their Arms tamely to the Enemy. Can any body say the same thing of Us now? I cannot call to mind above Two or Three at most of our People, that ever betray'd their Cause for fear of Death. I do not speak of a Soldiers Death with his Sword in his Hand, and in the Field of Battle; but of a Death of exquisite Cruelty and Torment: A Misery that many of Our People have been Expos'd to; not out of a Bloody Malice, as I verily persuade my self, but to try the Experiment of so Heroical a Constancy; and to see if there be any such Men in the World, as will rather be torn to pieces, than be Guilty of any One Word or Action Derogatory to the Dignity of their Laws.

The Jews stand all Tryals.

Now This Constancy of the Jews above All Other Nations is no Great Wonder neither; for the very Ordinary way of our Living would be a kind of Severity to any Other sort of People: That is to say, in the Fatigues of Labour; Hard Fare; Days of Indispensable Abstinence, and Rest; Course Lodging, Clothing, and the like. I would fain know now how These People, in the Heat and Freedom of a Military Life, would behave themselves at the same time in the Forbearance of Forbidden Meats, and in the Case of Other Restrictions: Whereas the Thing that we Glory in is the giving of our selves up to an Unchangeable Constancy and Resignation, in Obedience to Our Laws and Duties.

The Severity of the Jewish Discipline.

Wherefore let the Lysimachus's, and the Molon's, and all That Scribbling Crew of Censorious Pretenders, and Perverters of Youth: Let them all go on, I say, in their Uncharitable way of Representing Us for the worst of Men.

It is not Our Business to traduce Other People's Laws, but to keep Steady to Our Own. Nay, such was the Tenderness of our gentle Law-giver, that he would not suffer so much as the Least Indignity or Contempt to be put upon the Reputed Gods of Other Nations: And This he did, out of a Reverence to the very Name of a Deity. But it will not become us yet to be altogether Silent, in a Case where it is both so Easy, and so Necessary, to stop the Mouths of our Adversaries: And where, in truth, the Work is done by Other Authorities ready to our Hands. As for Instance. Where is That Wise Man among the Greeks, that does not heartily Exclaim even against the most Celebrated of their Poets, and Especially their Law-givers, for Poysoning the Common People with the Impious Doctrine of a Plurality of Gods; and advancing the Account to what Number they think fit, and deriving their Original from what Age and Countrey they please: Nay and allotting them their Proper Stations and Places, like Other Creatures! As they have their Subterranean Gods, their Sea-Gods; and the Eldest of the Race, or Family, they keep up in Chains in Hell. As for their Celestial Gods, they give Jupiter ('tis true) the Name of Father, but with the Heart and

The Greeks Fabulous Deities.

and Practice of a Tyrant: insomuch that his Wife, his Brother, and the Daughter of his Own Brain, enter'd into a Conspiracy, according to the Fiction, to destroy him, as he Himself had serv'd his Father. This was the Value, in fine, that all Wise Men had of These Fabulous Deities; the Fancy being so Ridiculous, that they could not so much as think of it without Scorn and Derision. Some of their Gods they make to be Striplings; Others in the Prime of their Youth and Strength, and Others again they represent to be Grave Seniors with Long Beards. They have their Gods likewise (or Patrons) of Mechanical Arts and Trades; as Smiths, Weavers, &c. Pilgrims, Champions, Harpers, Archers. They have their Fewds and Factions also among Themselves, and side with Mortals against One Another. They receive Wounds in the Quarrel; Grieve and Pine away under the Anguish of them. Nay, These Pretended Gods and Goddesses go further yet still, even to the Horrible Licence of Amours, and Embraces, Indifferently with Men and Women. And what's the Case of their Almighty Jupiter Himself: the Father, as they call him, and the Prince of their whole Train of Gods! But after the Whoring and Corrupting of his Mistresses, he has not the Power at last to save either them, or their Bastards; but with an Aking Heart, he sees them all Ruin'd before his Face, because the FATES will have it so.

What a Train have we here of Lewd and Execrable Debauches; and of worse Consequences in probability yet to come! Adulteries in Heaven, Open and Barefac'd; and not only committed by the Gods, but by Them also Celebrated and Proclaim'd; to the degree of Envying the Prostitutes. Now if their Sovereign Lord of Heaven and Earth, Jupiter Himself, could not hold out against the Charms of a Lascivious Strumpet; What are we to expect from the Passions and Weaknesses of Other Subordinate and Inferiour Deities! And what shall we say again of Gods turn'd into Shepherds, and Masons, and made Close Prisoners in Hell? Of Gods in Liveries, and Serving-Men for Wages! Can any Man now with Brains in his Head, do less than Abhor and Despise the Inventors, the Encouragers, and the Believers of These Blasphemous Stories? In some Cases again, they make Gods of their Passions, as Frights, Fears, and the like; and then Worship them in the worst of Forms; so that, there can be nothing so scandalous among Men, but may do well enough in the Character of One of Their Gods. And yet all this is not sufficient to deter the People from Sacrificing to the more Tolerable sort of These Monsters. But they look upon their Gods as the Authors of Good and Evil, and consequently as their Friends, or their Enemies, in Proportion to the One or the Other. Upon This Consideration they do by their Deities as with Ill-natur'd Men: they Worship, and Present them, for fear they should hurt them.

The Ground of so many Gross Mistakes concerning God.

But how comes Mankind all this While to Labour under so many Desperate and Dangerous Mistakes concerning God? Unless either from the Lawgiver's Ignorance of the Divine Nature from the Beginning, or else for want of Communicating to the World the Notions they had of Things, as Matters of little Moment perhaps in their Opinions; and so left the Poets and the Orators betwixt them to make their Own Gods; and by This Means Confounding their Politicks with Idle Tales and Amusements of Uncouth Deities and Strange Worship.

Painters and Statuaries create Deities.

Painters and Statuaries contributed also in a Great Measure to This Abuse, by the Liberty the Greeks took in dressing up their Gods in what Shape and Figure the Workman pleas'd, every Man according to his Particular Fancy. And they had their Varieties for Matter also as well as for Form: Some Working in Plaister; others (of the Better sort) in Gold and Ivory: Some in Sculpture; others in Colours: and the Last Piece, for Novelties sake, was still reputed the Best. As the Old Gods fell off, and went out of Fashion, they were succeeded insensibly by New: and upon the failing of One Religion, Another started up. It was the same Thing with their Temples too; as One was laid in Rubbish, Another was rais'd out of the Ruines of it: according to the Humour of the present Age; whereas the Worship of God ought to be as Unchangeable as God Himself.

A Divine Worship is as Unchangeable as God himself.

We may reckon Apollonius Molon in the Number of the overweaning Fools. But for Those among the Greeks that deserve the Name of Philosophers, They are no Strangers to the Truth of what I have deliver'd; but entertain the same Reverent Thoughts of God that we do, and with as sensible a Contempt for the Fables and Fooleries on the other hand, as they ought to have. It was not for nothing that Plato would suffer no Poets in his Common-wealth: Nay, he discharg'd Homer Himself too, though with all the Honours of a Poet Laureate, for fear the Fabulous Religion should destroy the True. This Great Man of all Others comes the nearest to the Example of Moses, in the Model of his Common-wealth; where he charges all his Subjects to study their Laws, and to get them by Heart, and not to intermingle

The Greek Sages had the same Veneration for a Deity with the Jews themselves.

Plato's Common-wealth in some sort the Model of Moses's.

mingle Customs with Strangers; but to preserve their Government in its Original Purity, and to pay a strict Obedience to their Ordinances and Decrees.

Apollonius Molon never thought of This, when he fell so heavily upon the Jews for not Joyning and Communicating with Men of a Differing Way and Perswasion, as if This were Our Case alone; whereas all People (generally speaking) do the same Thing; the Greeks Themselves, and the Soberest Men of the Party too.

The Lacedæmonians admit no Strangers.

The Lacedæmonians, we see, would not admit any Mixture of Strangers among them: no, nor so much as suffer their Citizens to travel abroad, for fear of Contracting Ill Habits either way: and Degenerating into a Liking Ill Customs and Manners. Now This was a Severity liable enough to a Censure, to debarr them the Common Privileges of Society and Commerce: But so far are we from This Unmerciful Rigour, that though we do not thrust our Selves into other People's Matters, we are yet ready and open to Entertain all Proselytes, and to receive Those that have a mind to joyn with us; which must not be deny'd to be a Generous and a Charitable Disposition.

The Athenians Open to all Proselytes.

But to pass now from the Lacedæmonians to the Athenians; who, on the Other hand, make it their Glory to give Admittance to All Strangers: But This was more, I suppose, than Apollonius was aware of. The Athenians were so Inexorably Zealous for the Honour of their Gods, that it was made Capital to let fall so much as one Irreverent Word upon that Subject. What was it that Socrates dy'd for? Not for betraying the Commonwealth, or burning their Temples; not for Treason or Sacrilege; but for framing New Oaths by the Direction, as he suggested, of a Divine Spirit. Whether This was Jest or Earnest, it remains a Secret to This Day: But for This it was however that Socrates was Try'd, Condemn'd, and put to Death by Poison. He was likewise Charg'd for injecting False Doctrines into the Heads of the People, and Endeavouring to supplant the Religion and the Laws of his Country. This was the End, in fine, of Socrates, a Citizen of Athens.

The Athenians made it Death to Act or Speak against their Religion.

I shall now produce Another Instance of Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, who was put to death for affirming, The Athenians God, the Sun, to be only a Red Hot Stone. And then there was a Talent Offer'd by Proclamation to any Man that should bring in the Head of Diagoras the Melian for Ridiculing the Mysteries of their Religion. And they would have gone the same way to Work with Protagoras too, if he had not gotten away in time. His pretended Crime was the Writing of a Tract, wherein he delivers himself doubtfully of the Athenian Gods. But what wonder is it to see Men treated at This Barbarous rate, where even the Women Themselves found no better Quarter. As for Example; Did they not put a Priestess to death, upon an Accusation of Worshipping Strange Gods? And was it not made Death also for any Man to introduce a Foreign Religion? What can be more Evident now, than that so far as These Laws were in Credit, the People could have no Faith in Other Gods? Beside that undoubtedly if they had, they would never have barr'd themselves the Comfort and Benefit of their Favour.

The Barbarous Scythians themselves have a Tenderness for Laws and Customs.

Nay, the Scythians Themselves, though the most Brutal and Blood-Thirsty People upon the Face of the Earth, made so Great a Scruple yet of preserving the Mysteries of their Profession, that they butcher'd the Famous Anacharsis, only for speaking too Reverently of the Grecian Gods. We read likewise of several of the Persians that suffer'd Death upon the same Account. Now for Molon, he was a known Friend to the Persian Laws, and One that had them in Admiration as well as the Greeks, for their Firmness and Agreement in the Matter of Worship (I speak of their Constancy upon the Burning of their Temples.) But Molon had not only a good Opinion of their Ways, but was also in some sort an Imitator of them, in the Extravagant Liberties he took of Abusing Other Men's Wives, and putting out the Eyes of their Children: Inhumanities that are declar'd Death without Mercy by our Laws, though Committed but upon Unreasonable Creatures.

The Constancy of the Jews, and the Grounds of it.

Such is the Veneration we have, in short, for the Observance of These Laws, that neither Power, Profit, Fear, or any Other Consideration under the Sun, can ever Divert, or Deter us from the Conscientious Discharge of our Duty. And we do not put our selves upon These Hazards and Experiments, in a Prospect of Picking a Quarrel, and making an Advantage of it, but for the Support and Maintenance of our Lawful Rights. We have submitted to all Other sorts of Outrage, with Patience, and Resignation; but whoever pinches upon our Laws, touches us to the Quick: In which Case the Sense of That Oppression hath made us Daring and Obstinate to the Last Degree. But what have we to do, to Envy the Laws of Other Nations, which we see abandon'd by the very Founders of them? What have the Lacedæmonians to say for Themselves in Excuse of their Hard-Hearted Inhospitality; and the Liberties they take in an Unmarry'd Life? And so for the People of Elis, and Thebes, in the Impudence of their Unnatural Luſts? A Practice that a Shameleſs Connivance hath almoſt turn'd into a Legal Allowance: And it hath ſo far prevail'd among the Greeks alſo, that they have Intitled their very Gods to the Abuſe; who in the Heat of an Unbridled Appetite, coupled with their Own Siſters, and Compounded for the Tranſgreſſion.

and

The Practices of Lewd Lawgivers.

What ſhall we think of Thoſe Lawgivers now, that take more Pains to ſave the Criminals than to puniſh them; by Commuting for a Pecuniary Mulct in the Caſe of Adultery, and Atoning for Fornication by Marrying the Abuſed Virgin? It would be Endleſs to ſumm up all the Deſperate Temptations to the Renouncing of Piety and Virtue, that are thrown out to Unwary People, in Theſe Compoſitions and Expedients; even to the total Subverſion of their Laws: Nay, the Reſolution is often taken beforehand of trampling all that is Sacred under Foot. But This can never be ſaid of Us, whom neither Diſtance, Abſence, Tyranny, nor Death it ſelf, the ſaving of Life, Liberty, or Fortune could ever remove from the Rule of our Obligation. Now if it be for the Intrinſick Excellency of Our Laws, that Our Hearts are ſo ſet upon them, it muſt be granted, that our Affections are well plac'd, and that the Laws Themſelves anſwer the End they were made for: but if it ſhall be ſaid, that they are void of all Goodneſs, how much more to blame are They that pretend to have Better Laws of Their Own, and will not maintain them?

The Antiquity of a Law, Proves the Goodneſs of it.

But Time tries all Things, and no ſuch Proof of the Goodneſs of a Law as the Antiquity of it. So that we ſhall caſt the Cauſe upon That Iſſue for the Honour both of our Lawgiver, and of the Laws Themſelves; with a Regard to God's Holy Worſhip. It will be granted us beyond all Controverſie, that Moſes was the Firſt Lawgiver we read of, by many Ages; and that as Our Laws had their Original from thence, ſo they were follow'd and imitated, more or leſs by all Other Nations. The Ancient Greeks, as to the Generality of them, had in appearance, I muſt Confeſs, their Laws apart; but their Philoſophers had all this while the very ſame Perſwaſion of God that we have, and inculcated the ſame Doctrines of Life and Manners.

All Nations Imitate the Jews, more or leſs.

Nay, ſuch is the Reputation we have had a long time in the World, for our Piety and good Government, that there is hardly any Nation, either Greek, or Barbarian, that does not live in ſome ſort of Conformity to our Example: either in the Obſervance of our Seventh Day's Sabbath; the Uſe of Lamps; the Celebration of Faſts; Abſtinence from ſuch and ſuch certain Meats: and ſo in Matter of Humanity; Charitable Agreement, and Society; Indefatigable Labour and Induſtry, and an Invincible Conſtancy in Suffering for the Truth. In All Theſe Obſervations, I ſay, they do but write after Our Copy.

But the moſt Wonderful Thing of All is yet to come: That is to ſay; How This ſingle Body of Laws ſhould of it ſelf work ſo Powerfully upon all Mankind, without any Other Authority for the putting of it in Execution; and influencing Men's Minds, in ſome Proportion as the Almighty influences the Univerſe. Now whoſoever looks but into his Own Country, or into his Own Family, will find all This to be True that I have ſaid.

Will any Man adviſe us now, that does not Hate us, to change our Old Laws for New Ones; and the Better for the Worſe too? Or if it be Otherwiſe, let the People give over Reproaching us. We do not eſpouſe This Cauſe out of Ill-Will to any Man, but out of the Veneration we have for the Memory of our Prophet; and in a Full Perſwaſion that God Himſelf ſpeaks to us by the Mouth of Moſes. Or make it the Caſe now, that we did not ſufficiently Underſtand the Value of our Own Laws, purely upon their Own Account; the Mighty Number of Profeſſors and Admirers, would be enough to give us a High Eſteem of them. I have handled this Subject more at large in my Antiquities, being forc'd upon what I have ſaid at preſent, by a kind of Neceſſity, for the Vindication of Truth againſt Calumny and Injuſtice, without any Deſign of Advancing our Own Credit upon the Diſparagement of Others.

The Jews no Upſtarts.

To draw towards a Concluſion, I reckon now that I have been as good as my Word to every Point of my Undertaking; for I have abundantly prov'd the Antiquity of a People that were Calumniated for Upſtarts; and I have likewiſe produc'd ſeveral Eminent Authorities, that make Honourable Mention of us in their Annals.

Several Malicious Scandals Diſprov'd.

They will have it that our Anceſtors came Originally out of Ægypt; which I have undeniably diſprov'd. They have trump'd up Another Story of our being Expell'd Ægypt for Corporal Maladies, and Contagious Diſtempers: Whereas I have made it Evident on the Other hand, that they cut out their Way thorough the Troops of their Enemies, into their Own Country. There are Others again, that repreſent Moſes for One of the Worſt of Men, in Contradiction to the Concurrent Teſtimonies of ſeveral Ages to his Immortal Honour.

As

As to the Vindication of our Laws from Scandalous Tongues, there needs no more to Convince any Man of the Piety and Wiſdom of them, than barely to Read, and to Underſtand them. Theſe Laws are in the Firſt place, declar'd Enemies to Iniquity, Luxury and Faction; and Promoters of Peace, Charity, Induſtry and Juſtice: They allow of no War, either of Ambition, or Avarice: Neither do they approve of Returning Evil for Evil. They Encourage Boldneſs and Reſolution in the Common Defence. They precaution People againſt being Circumvented with Fair and Falſe Pretences; and teach Men to make their Actions ſpeak more than their Words. The Deſign and Intent of the Jewiſh Laws.

Upon Theſe Conſiderations, I may confidently affirm, That we have the Beſt Laws under the Sun. For what is there in Nature beyond an Inviolable Piety? What more Reaſonable than to be under the Government of Laws? What more Agreeable, and Beneficial than Union in Proſperity, and a True Friendſhip in Adverſity? A Fearleſs Bravery in the Hazards of War; a Sedulous Application to Arts and Huſbandry in Times of Peace: and finally; whatever we do, or whereſoever we are, to have it conſtantly in our Minds, that an All-ſeeing God overlooks Us, and a Divine Providence governs all Things. Now if Theſe Laws were either written Elſewhere, or lodg'd in Other Hands before they came to Us, we are to acknowledge the ſame Obligation to them that had them firſt in Poſſeſſion, that the Pupil owes to his Tutor. But if they were never ſeen or heard of any where elſe before: and if from Time to Time, we have made them Conſtantly the Preciſe Rule of our Practice and Profeſſion (as we have moſt certainly done) let the Apion's and the Molon's, and All that Snarling Faction, ſay and do their Worſt; I have my End in the Account I have given to the Generous Epaphroditus, and Other Curious Inquiſitors into the Truth of Our Story. The Original of the Jews Laws. The Jews make their Laws the Rule of their Lives and Manners.

Concerning the Governing Power of REASON.

CHAP. I. MY Deſign in This Diſcourſe being to ſhew, That Reaſon is the Perfection of Wiſdom, as will appear, if it can be proved, that This, duely improv'd by Study and Religion, is Maſter of the Paſſions; It is very fit I exhort my Readers, to apply themſelves to the attaining of Wiſdom with all poſſible Attention. For Reaſon is a neceſſary Preliminary to Knowledge, and in giving the Commendation of Excelling in this, we evidently imply the Character of Excelling in the Nobleſt and moſt Comprehenſive of all Vertues, which is that of Prudence. The Caſe will be the ſame with regard to the Reſt, if Reaſon may be ſhewn effectually to reſtrain and maſter thoſe Vile Affections of Gluttony and Exceſs, Laſciviouſneſs and Senſual Appetite, which obſtruct, and are oppoſite to Temperance. And ſo again, to correct that Malignity of Nature, and all thoſe corrupt Inclinations, which hinder the Practice and Love of Juſtice: And after the ſame manner, Laſtly, to ſubdue the Paſſions of Anger, and Fear, and Grief, and whatever elſe emaſculates the Mind, or is contrary to that Generous and Steady Temper of Soul, which makes the Fourth Cardinal Vertue, and is known by the Name of Fortitude.

To all This it may perhaps be objected, That they who aſcribe to Reaſon the Dominion I am contending for, are eaſily confuted from common Experience. For, were it thus ſuperiour to the Paſſions, it would have the ſame controuling Sovereignty over Ignorance and Forgetfulneſs, which yet it manifeſtly hath not. But This, I muſt needs ſay, is a Ridiculous Objection, and miſtakes the State of the Queſtion. For when we affirm Reaſon to be Maſter of the Paſſions, we mean, ſuch Defects of Nature only as are oppoſite to Juſtice, and Temperance, and Fortitude; all which are of a Diſtinct Kind, and belong to the Senſitive Soul; but not ſuch as are Defects peculiar to it ſelf, and ſtick to the Rational Soul. Again, the Nature of This Sovereignty is quite miſtaken by the Objector; for by it we do not mean, That Reaſon takes thoſe Affections it governs clean away (as it muſt do, if Ignorance and Forgetfulneſs were the Objects of its Power) but only that it does not tamely yield to, nor ſuffer it ſelf to be vanquiſh'd by them.

Now that it is in the Power of Reaſon to command and ſubdue the Paſſions, I could by great Variety of Arguments Demonſtrate; but ſhall at preſent chooſe to confine my ſelf to that moſt Popular and Undeniable One, Matter of Fact. The Examples, I would ſay, of Perſons who have ſignaliz'd themſelves by courageouſly aſſerting and Dying in Defence of Truth and Virtue; among which, none I think are more Conſpicuous, none more deſervedly Admir'd than thoſe of our Own Country, Eleazar and the Seven Brethren Martyr'd with their Mother. For, all Theſe deſpiſing the moſt exquiſite Pains and Tortures, and perſevering even unto Death, have put it paſt a Doubt, how abſolute a command Reaſon hath over the Paſſions. So that my preſent buſineſs ſhall be, to give Theſe Brave Men, and That Incomparable Woman, the Praiſes due to their Immoveable Conſtancy, and to congratulate the Honours, which all ſucceeding Ages muſt acknowledge to belong to their ſtedfaſt adherence to Virtue and their Duty. Theſe Men, indeed, excited the admiration not only of all Others that were indifferent and unbiaſs'd Spectators or Readers of their Sufferings, but even of Thoſe very Enemies and moſt prejudic'd Tormentors, who ſtood Aſtoniſh'd, at that Courage and Patience, which their Own Implacable Malice exercis'd after ſo Inhuman and Barbarous a Manner. They thus became the Occaſions of Releaſing their Nation from Oppreſſion, Conquering the Rage of a Tyrant by their Sufferings, and becoming a Sacrifice of Expiation for their Country.

The Method, then, which I intend to take, ſhall be, Firſt, To ſay ſomething in General concerning the Point in Debate, and then to ſpeak to This Inſtance in Particular; ticular; Giving as is fit due Glory to that All-wiſe God, who hath been pleaſed to leave us ſo Pregnant and uncontroulable an Evidence of this Truth, in the Perſons whoſe Vertues I am now about to Celebrate.

The Queſtion to be reſolved is plainly this, Whether Reaſon can Controul and Govern the Paſſions; and, in order to this Reſolution, 'tis fit we Firſt Explain what we mean by Reaſon, what by Paſſion, how many diſtinct Species of Paſſions there be, and whether this Dominion of Reaſon, which we aſſert, extend to All, or but ſome Sorts of Paſſions. By Reaſon then, I mean the Intellectual Faculty Improved and Rightly Guided by Conſideration, and making a Life of Wiſdom it's Choice and Chief concern. By Wiſdom again I Underſtand the Knowledge of Divine and Humane Affairs, and the true Cauſes, and Grounds of Each: Such as we attain to by the Diſcipline and Inſtruction of the Law: Which teacheth us, to Embrace thoſe Truths which Relate to God with Reverence, and thoſe regarding Man, as Things directed to, and Uſeful for the Benefit of the World. Wiſdom again is Commonly Branched into, and allowed to Conſiſt of, Four Principal Vertues; to Wit, Prudence, Juſtice, Fortitude, and Temperance. The Nobleſt and moſt Comprehenſive of theſe is Prudence; And to this it is chiefly, that Reaſon is beholding for the Dominion it attains to over the Paſſions.

Thoſe Paſſions again may be reduced to two ſo general heads, as ſhall include them all. Pleaſure, I mean, and Pain: Each of which acts upon the Soul as its proper Object. And Each again hath ſeveral other Affections coupled as it were in Pairs to attend it, and diverſified by Time and other Circumſtances from its Maſter-Paſſion. Thus in the Caſe of Pleaſure, that which goes before it, is Deſire; that which follows after it, is Joy: And So for Pain too, Fear goes before and Sorrow comes behind it. But Anger, I think, will not fall under any ſuch Diſtinction, being rather a mixt Paſſion, adminiſtring Somewhat of Pleaſure and Pain both, to them who are Senſible when it comes upon them, and nicely Obſerve how they are Affected with it. Under the Head of Pleaſure, again, there appears to be included a moſt Vile and Fruitful Malignity, the moſt Various and Complicated of any Paſſion whatſoever; So Scandalous is it's product, ſo Manifold its Forms: The Mind is chiefly vitiated by it, when it appears in Arrogance, and Avarice, Envy, and Contention: And the Body more immediately concerned, when it Breaks out in Greedineſs and Sordidneſs; for Pleaſure and Pain grow out of the Soul and Body, like Branches out of a Common Stock, and each of theſe Branches, have abundance of other under affections, which Sprout out of them like little Shoots and Suckers. Now all theſe it is the proper Province of Reaſon, like a skillful Vine-Dreſſer, to Prune and Purge, to Correct and Manage, and by all poſſible ways to Tranſplant and Ennoble, by Sweetning all the Wild and Sowre kinds, and ſo Cultivating and Improving that Subject Matter of Paſſions and Habits, that even that which is by Nature Refuſe and Vitious, may by Art and Management be made Generous and Good. For Reaſon leads us on to, and advances Virtue, by Reſtraining and Over-powering the Vehemence of thoſe Paſſions which carry us away into Vice. And that this is not affirmed without ground, convince your ſelf what a mighty effect it hath in Matters where the Vertue of Temperance is obſtructed. Now Temperance is nothing elſe but the Maſtery obtained over a Mans Deſires: And this is Attained by Reaſon. Of theſe Deſires ſome are more peculiarly concern'd with the Soul, and others with the Body, and of both theſe Sorts Reaſon ſeems to have the Command; For I cannot but conclude, that when our Appetites ſtand very ſtrongly to ſuch Fiſh and Fowl and other Delicious Food as are forbidden by our Law, and We, notwithſtanding ſuch Inclinations, do abſtain from them upon that very Account, that we ought not to Indulge the uſe of them; this is a very plain Inſtance how high a Hand Reaſon carries over theſe Paſſions; Which thus does in the Temperate Man, not only ſuſpend, but wholly tame and turn into another courſe, the moſt eager Deſires of the Lower of theſe Diviſions, and perfectly tie up all the Motions of the Body, that it ſhall not make any Strong effort or ſtruggle, in Oppoſition to the Word of Command given by this Governour above.

CHAP. II.

But this perhaps will not deſerve to be thought any great Matter, in Compariſon of thoſe moſt Furious Deſires of the Soul which Luſt and Beauty kindle; and yet for abſolutely Quelling theſe, even when Invited to Gratifie them, and urged by all the Fire of Youth to Comply with ſuch Invitation, Joſeph hath got himſelf Immortal Renown. Nor is even this Allaying the Fury of Vehement purſuits after Pleaſure, and abſtaining from the Impure Act, the utmoſt Reaſon may or ought to do, for it is plain our very Inclinations are under it's Juriſdiction. Otherwiſe the Law would have been moſt abſurd in laying upon us a Command ſo Impracticable as that, Thou ſhalt not Covet thy Neighbours Wife, or any thing that is thy Neighbours. Now

Gen. xxxix.

Exodus xx. 17.

Now it is plain, that when the Law forbids us ſo much as to Deſire at all, it much more Strongly Inplies, that Reaſon is able to Curb and Conquer our Deſires. And thus it is, not only in thoſe things which are Oppoſite to the Vertue of Temperance, but that of Juſtice alſo. For otherwiſe, what Remedy could there be for Reforming the Gluttonous and Greedy, the Niggardly, and Sordid Man? But now, as ſoon as any Man orders his Converſation, according to the Precepts of our Law, though he be of never ſo Covetous a Diſpoſition, yet does he find himſelf obliged to lend to the Poor without taking Uſury for his Money, and to Remitt the Debt at the Year of Jubilee; And though he be never ſo Frugal, yet is he Conſtrained by this Law, neither to gather in the Fruits of his Field or his Vineyard in the Sabbatick-Year.

See Levit. xxv. Exod. xxii. 25.

Several other Inſtances I could likewiſe produce, whereby it will appear, that Reaſon Governs our Paſſions. For the Law does in ſome caſes Exerciſe Dominion over the Natural Affection to our Parents, forbidding us for their Sakes to betray the Cauſe of Truth and Virtue; ſo does it over the Tenderneſs to our Wives, commanding us to Puniſh them for the Tranſgreſſion of their Duty; ſo again over the Love to our Children, by ordering us to make them Examples when they do amiſs; ſo Laſtly over the Kindneſs to our Friends, by Directing us to Reprove their Vices. And to Confirm this Truth yet more, and ſhew it Practicable, Reaſon, when acting by the Law, does overcome our hatred to our Enemies too; for it prohibits the Cutting down their Fruit Trees; it orders us to Reſtore to our Enemies the things which they have loſt, and to help their Cattel when fallen and in Diſtreſs.

Deut. xx. 19. Exod. xxiii. 4, 5.

Further yet, Reaſon, it is evident, bears ſway over even the moſt Violent Paſſions, ſuch as Ambition, Vain-Glory, and Envy: For all theſe evil Diſpoſitions the Sober and Conſiderate Mind ſubdues and drives away, as it does Anger alſo, which, though the moſt Ungovernable of all Paſſions, is yet Subject to Reaſon. Were it not ſo, how could our wiſe Anceſtor Jacob ſo ſeverely Condemn that Fact of his Sons, Simeon and Levi, when they, contrary to Reaſon, did utterly deſtroy the Whole Race of the Sichemites? Saying in Abhorrence of their Intemperate Rage, Curſed be their Anger for it was Fierce, and their Wrath for it was Cruel; which Words are plainly the Voice of Reaſon getting the better of Reſentment.

Gen. xxxiv. and xlix. 7.

In a word, When God Created Man, and endued him with a Power of Conſideration, and free Choice, he did at the ſame Time implant in his Nature Variety of Paſſions and Diſpoſitions, and ſet his Intellectual Mind in the Throne, to Exerciſe Government over all the Senſual Appetites within. Which being done, he gave this Law, as a Rule whereby the Man might exerciſe that Government, and lead a Life of Temperance, Juſtice and Goodneſs. What ground then can there be for that Objection, which makes a doubt whether Reaſon can maſter the Paſſions, becauſe it does not appear, that it attains to an Abſolute Maſtery over Forgetfullneſs and Ignorance?

CHAP. III. This, as I ſaid, is a very Ridiculous Exception, for Reaſon does not appear to have an Abſolute power over ſuch Defects as belong to the Intellectual Soul; but ſuch as are Senſitive and Bodily. Nor is its Power over Theſe Pretended to be ſuch, as ſhould Extirpate and quite take away our Deſires, but only ſuch as preſerves Men from being Enſlaved to their Deſires. No Man can utterly cut off the Paſſion of Anger, but he may by Reaſon find Remedies againſt it, and prevent his being Born down by the Violence of it.

We are not to Expect that Reaſon ſhould ſet us clear from all Evil Diſpoſitions; but it will Succour us in our Conflicts with, and enable us to Stand our Ground againſt, ſuch Diſpoſitions: For the proper Office of Reaſon is not to change, but to aſſiſt Nature; Not to be a Deſtroyer but an Auxiliary.

This Matter may Receive ſome Illuſtration from the Example of David. We read, that He, after having engaged a whole Day with an Army of Philiſtines, and made a great Slaughter of them, did in the Evening retire into the Royal-Tent, Fatigued and Spent, where all the Forces of our Forefathers were encamped round about him. The reſt of the Company refreſhed themſelves contentedly; but the King, being exceeding Thirſty, could not ſatisfie his Appetite, with any Water drawn out of thoſe Springs of which they had plenty at Hand. An Inconſiderate deſire ſeized him to drink of the Water fetched from the Enemies Garriſon. Hereupon ſome of the King's Mighty Men, being deeply concerned to Satisfie the Kings longing, Armed themſelves, took a Pitcher, broke through the Enemies Trenches, paſs'd their Guards, ſought out the Well of Bethlehem, and brought from thence to the King the Water which he ſo vehemently long'd for. But He, though parched with Thirſt and eager Deſire, recollected how Dangerous and Sinful a Thing it would be, to gratifie his Appetite at the Hazard

2. Sam. xxiii.

Hazard of his Servant's Lives; and thought the Drinking that Water would be in Effect to drink their Blood: And therefore, Oppoſing his Reaſon to his Inclination, he powred it out Solemnly to the Lord. Thus a mind ſtrictly Temperate and Wiſe, is able to overcome the Strongeſt Paſſions, to quench the Burnings of the moſt Furious Deſires, to contend with the moſt exquiſite Bodily Pains, and vanquiſh all the Force of Paſſion, by a Steddy Principle of Virtue and Goodneſs. And now I think it ſeaſonable to confirm this Argument by Demonſtrative Proofs of this Power of Reaſon exemplified by Practice; Of which our Fathers have given undeniable Inſtances: For, after that by their ſtrict Obſervance of the Law, and Singular good Lives, they had won upon the Hearts of foreign Princes and prevailed upon Seleucus Nicanor the King of Aſia, ſo far, that He ſet apart a Portion of his Publick Revenues to defray the Expence of the Sacrifices, and did highly approve their Conſtitution; It happened, that, after this Profound Tranquillity, Some of them were brought under Various and Severe Trials, by the ill Offices of Wicked Men, who diſturbed the Publick Peace, in ſuch Manner as the following Chapter ſhall relate. 2 Mac. III. t. 2, 3.

CHAP. IV.

One Simon, who had a Quarrel to Onias, the then High-Prieſt, and ſo conſtituted for Life; after having tried in Vain, and to the great Prejudice of our Nation, to blacken this Excellently good Man, with all Manner of Calumnies; finding himſelf not able to leſſen him in the Affections and Eſteem of his own People, fled to a Foreign Court with Wicked Intent to betray his Country. This Wicked Wretch applying himſelf to Apollonius, who was then Governour of Syria and Phœnicia, told him, that out of his great Zeal for the King his Maſter, he was come to make a Diſcovery to him, which might be of conſiderable Advantage to his Majeſty's Affairs. It was, That in the Treaſury at Jeruſalem there lay concealed ſeveral Millions of Money, not appropriated to the Temple, or employed to any Publick Uſe, but Wealth hoarded up by Private Men, and ſo of Right belonging to Seleucus. Apollonius, having received this Account, commended Simon's Zeal for the King's Service, waited upon Seleucus, and Imparted to him the Secret. Upon this Information he ſoon obtained a Commiſſion from the King, and ſtraight marched into our Country, bringing along with him the curſed Traitor Simon, and a very Powerfull Army.

The Cauſe of his Expedition he declared to be, That he might Execute (a) the King's Command, who had ordered him to ſeize upon all the Money reſerved in the Publick Treaſury for the uſe of private Men. The Nation taking an Alarm, and complaining of it, as a horrible Injuſtice, to take away the Treaſure which had for greater Security been depoſited in the Temple, did all they could to divert him from his Purpoſe. But Apollonius with Menaces and force made up to the Temple. There might you ſee a Multitude of Prieſts and Women and Children, all proſtrating themſelves before the Holy Place, Earneſtly begging God that He would defend his own Temple from Prophanation and Contempt.

But Apollonius ſtill perſiſting, and entring the Place with a Body of Armed Men, as he was about to ſeize upon the Treaſury, Behold Angels from Heaven ſuddenly appeared Mounted on Horſes, Clad in Shining Armour, and Struck the Men immediately with Fear and Trembling. As for Apollonius himſelf, he fell down to the Ground in the Court of the Gentiles, half dead, Stretching out his Hands to Heaven and Supplicating the Hebrews with many Tears, that they would pray for him, that he might not be deſtroyed by that Hoſt from Heaven. The High Prieſt Onias moved with Compaſſion, and fearing beſides leaſt Seleucus the King ſhould impute the Death of Apollonius to the Treachery and Contrivance of Men, granted his Requeſt and prayed to God for him. So this Man, being Miraculouſly ſaved, returned back to the King, and made a Faithful Relation of all that had befallen him.

But after the Death of Seleucus the King, his Son (b) Antiochus, a Man of a proud Spirit and Savage Diſpoſition, ſucceeded in the Throne. This Man, having deprived Onias of the Prieſthood, put into that Office his Brother Jaſon, upon Conſideration of a yearly Tribute of Three Thouſand ſix Hundred and Sixty Talents, which he had covenanted to pay him; Him therefore the King conſtituted Superintendent, not in Eccleſiaſtical only as High Prieſt, but in Civil Affairs alſo; He then began to put our Nation under ſevere Tryals, and, by introducing of new Cuſtoms contrary to the Law, ſeduced them to Foreign Uſages and all manner of Wickedneſs. He did not only Inſtitute Græcian Games in the Metropolis of our Nation, but drew off the Prieſts from the Service of the Temple. With which Im- 2 Mac. iv.

piety the Juſtice of God being provoked, ſtirred up Antiochus to make war upon them. For, while he was engaged in an Expedition againſt Ptolemy King of Egypt, being 2 Mac. v. informed, that ſome of the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, had expreſſed great Joy at a report of his being dead; he preſently turned his Forces that way, and made miſerable havock of them; Publiſhing withal a Decree, that all they ſhould be put to Death, who perſevered in the Cuſtoms of their own Country, and lived ac-
2 Mac. vi. cording to the Law of Moſes; and finding, that this Decree had not its intended Effect, but that all his ſevereſt Threatenings and Puniſhments were ſo far deſpiſed, as that even the Women, who continued to Circumciſe their Children, were caſt down headlong from the Walls of the City; and ſtill perſiſted in ſo doing, notwithſtanding they knew what would follow: Perceiving, I ſay, how little regard the People paid to his impious Decrees, He came in Perſon, and by Torments compelled thoſe that were brought before him, to eat of meats Forbidden and Unclean by the Law, and ſo ſolemnly to Abjure the Jewiſh Religion in his Preſence.

CHAP. V. It happened about this time, that Antiochus the Tyrant, ſeating himſelf upon an Eminent Place, and ſurrounded with his Counſellors and Rulers, and a ſtrong Body of Armed Men, commanded many of the Hebrews to be brought by force before him, and there to be Compelled to Eat of Swines Fleſh, and Meats offered to Idols. Which if any refuſed to Pollute themſelves with, they were immediately put to the Torture and ſlain before him. When many had been thus barbarouſly treated, at length one Eleazar a Principal Man of the City, of the Prieſts Family, a Lawyer by Profeſſion, far advanced in Years, known and well Eſteemed by many that retained to Antiochus by reaſon of his Age and Character, was brought before him. Antiochus, beholding the Man, ſpake to him in the Following manner. "Before I proceed to uſe any Severity, let me adviſe thee, "Reverend Old Man, to ſave thy own Life by ſubmitting to eat of Swines Fleſh, for "I pay great reſpect to thy Age and Gray-Hairs, and am ſurprized, that the Expe-"rience of ſo many years ſhould not have made thee wiſer, than ſtill to perſevere in "the Jewiſh Superſtition. It ſeems to me a moſt unreaſonable thing for Men to a-"bridge themſelves of any innocent Pleaſures, and great Injuſtice to themſelves and In-"gratitude to Nature, to refuſe any of thoſe Enjoyments which her bounty hath pro-"vided for us. Why ſhouldſt thou then expreſs ſuch abhorrence of that moſt De-"licious of all Meats, which She ſeems, in the Fleſh of Swine, to have deſigned as "our beſt Entertainment, and a Singular Favour? This may in others ſeem ſomewhat "more Excuſable, but in You, who are a Perſon of better Judgment, it would be a "moſt unaccountable folly, to be prejudiced by a falſe and empty Notion of Religion, "and for an Idle Fancy to contemn My Authority, and draw a needleſs Puniſhment "upon your Own Head; Wilt not thou then ſuffer thy Eyes to be opened, and be "awakened out of this Dream of thy Peculiar Perſwaſion, and ſet thy ſelf free from "the Bondage of ſo Moroſe and Singular a Notion? Will this Friendly Expoſtulation "prevail for no Deference to be paid my kindneſs; and the Compaſſion I have for thy "Age, move thee to no Compaſſion upon thy ſelf? Methinks it ſhould; for though "what I have ſaid does not Convince thee of the Vanity of thy Opinion in this Point, "yet you muſt needs allow, that if there be a Power above, which does, as you ſup-"poſe, require the Obſervance of this Religion, that Power hath ſo much Goodneſs, "as to pardon the Tranſgreſſion of his Laws, when this is not the Offender's own "Act and Choice, but the Effect of Force and pure Conſtraint.

Eleazar having heard theſe Words, begged of the King liberty to ſpeak for himſelf. Which being granted, he did in the Preſence of all the Aſſembly, deliver himſelf to this Effect. "Be pleaſed to underſtand, Royal Sir, That We, who are fully "convinced, that it is our Duty, in all things to behave our ſelves according to the "Law given us by God, are perfectly perſwaded, that no Neceſſity can more oblige "us, no Force be ſtronger upon us, than that by which we ſtand bound to obey his "Law, and for this Reaſon we think our Acting contrary to it, cannot be diſpenſed "with on any Terms whatſoever. Nay though our Law were not, as you are pleaſed "to ſuggeſt, really Divine; yet, Sir, I muſt crave leave to ſay, that ſo long as we con-"tinue to believe it Divine, that very Perſwaſion ought to be an Effectual Reſtraint "upon us, from Violating, or thinking meanly of any Religious Ordinances eſtabliſh-"ed by it. Do not therefore Imagine, Sir, if we ſhould ſubmit to defile our ſelves by "unclean Meats, that this would be reckoned a ſmall and pardonable Fault. For "the Preſumption of the Offender is the ſame, and the Authority of the Law equally "inſulted, be the Inſtance in which a Man Tranſgreſſes greater or leſs. The fact it "ſelf makes no Difference in point of Guilt. Next you were pleaſed, Sir, to ſpeak "Contemptuouſly of our Religion, as an Inſtitution unbecoming Men of Reaſon, and "Philoſophy. But I muſt be bold to ſay, it is the beſt and moſt Conſummate Philoſophy; "for it Teaches us Temperance, the Conqueſt of our Paſſions and Deſires, and ſets

"us

" us above all our Pleaſures. It trains us up in the Exerciſe of Fortitude, and com" mands us to undergo all Manner of Pain willingly and chearfully: It teaches us
" the moſt exact Juſtice, and orders us to confine our Worſhip and abſolute Reve" rence, to the one true God where alone they are of Right due. Upon this account
" we dare not eat things Prohibited and Unclean: For we are fully perſwaded, that " God who created our Nature had due regard to it; that the very Inſtitution of this " Law was ſo far from a Hardſhip as in it ſelf to be an Act of Goodneſs and Mercy;
" and that the things forbidden are hurtful to our Souls, whereas thoſe allowed for " food are Uſeful and Convenient for us. It is therefore the very Extremity of Tyran-" ny, to force us, not only to ſin againſt our Law, but to eat that which is therefore " not allowed us, becauſe of a quality not fit to be eaten. But this, Sir, is a ſort of " Triumph which I ſhall never give You over Me. Nor muſt I falſify the ſolemn Oaths
" and Holy Engagements, whereby our Anceſtors have bound themſelves and their
" Poſterity to the faithful Obſervance of this Law; not though you ſhould Command
" my Eyes to be bored out and my Bowels to be burnt. No, Sir, old Age hath not ſo
" impaired my Mind, or enfeebled my Body, but that when Religion and Duty call me
" to it, my Reaſon can yet approve it ſelf, youthful and vigorous. If this Reply
" provoke you, prepare your Inſtruments of Torture and heat your Furnace hotter
" ſtill, all That ſhall not move me to ſpare my Old Age, ſo as for the ſaving my " Perſon, to violate the Law of my Country and my God. No, Holy Law to which " I owe my Inſtruction, I will never deſert ſo Excellent a Maſter; No, thou Deareſt of " all Virtues, Temperance, by which we preſerve our Native Sovereignty over our Ap" petites, I will never abjure thee; No, thou beſt of all Philoſophy, I will never diſ-
" grace Thee; No, Holy Order of Prieſthood, and Study of the Law, I will neither " forego, nor be a Blemiſh to you. My Anceſtors ſhall find me come to them pure
" and conſtant, a Soul as free from ſuch a Stain, as undaunted under all Manner of " Torments even unto Death.

When he had made this Noble Reply to the Tyrants treacherous Exhortations, CHAP. IV.
the Souldiers that ſtood by handled him very roughly, and dragged him in rage to the Place of Execution. There firſt of all they ſtript off his Cloaths, then having pinioned him, they laid him on on either ſide with Whips, till they had perfectly flayed him; An Officer on each ſide crying at every ſtroke, Obey the King's Commandment. But the brave Eleazar was no more moved by their ſcourgings, than if all he endured had been but a Dream. The good Old Man ſtood with his Eyes lift up to Heaven, his Fleſh torn off from his ſides, to the very Bone, the Blood ſtreaming down from his Body to the Ground; till at laſt being no longer able to bear up, againſt ſuch Wounds and Pains, and Loſs of Blood, he fell down upon the Pavement: But this was an infirmity confined to his Body, for ſtill his Mind was as erect, as far from being bent as ever: Hereupon one of the mercileſs Souldiers ſtamped upon his Belly, and ſpurned his Sides and Stomach, to raiſe him up again. Still he ſuſtained their barbarous inſolence, deſpiſed the Force they would have put upon him, and bore his Pains with ſo much Magnanimity, that even he, who lay under the Torment, vanquiſhed the Hard-hearted Wretches that inflicted it, and moved their Admiration by ſo Reſolute and Noble a Soul, in a Body ſo Aged and Infirm.

Some of theſe therefore, partly in mere pity to his Years, and partly upon the account of former Acquaintance with him, though they were Servants to the King, drew near and ſaid, " Why doſt thou thus, for no manner of Reaſon, expoſe thy ſelf
" to all theſe Sufferings? Permit us Eleazar, to ſet before thee ſome Lawful and Clean
" Meats, and do thou make as tho' thou didſt eat Swines Fleſh according to the Kings
" command, ſo ſhalt thou ſave thy life, and yet commit no Wickedneſs. But Eleazar anſwered, " Far be it from us, who are Children of Abraham, to be guilty of ſuch
" Cowardice and wicked Subtilty, by ſo much as Seeming to do an Act that does not " become us. How abſurd would it be for me who have led a Life of Sincerity and " Truth hitherto, and preſerved my Reputation free from blemiſh, by a ſtrict Obſer-
" vation of the Law, to change my courſe now in extreme Old Age, and ſet an ill
" Example to others; to purchaſe a little Remainder of Life at the Expence of foul
" Diſſimulation, and live that little while a Scorn and Laughing ſtock to all the World,
" for my Fear and baſe Complyance? When they perceived him thus Reſolute and Inflexible, and that their Pity could have no manner of Influence upon him, they changed their Diſpoſition, and brought him to the Fire. There they applied new Inſtruments of Torture, threw him upon the Fuel, and as he burnt, poured ſcalding and ſtinking Liquors up his Noſtrils. He in the mean while, burnt to the very bone, and ready to expire, lifted up his Eyes to Heaven and ſaid, " Thou ſeeſt, my " God, the Miſeries I endure, and that I chooſe to dye by Fire, and Torment, for the " ſake of thy Law, when it was in my Power to preſerve my Life by tranſgreſſing

" it;

" it; Be thou therefore Gracious, O Lord, to thy own People, and let the Vengeance " executed on Me, ſuffice for what they have deſerved, make thou my Blood a " Purification for them, and accept my Life inſtead of their Lives. And with theſe Words the Holy Man gave up the Ghoſt.

This Example ſure will put it paſt diſpute, that Reaſon improved by Religion, is maſter of Men's Paſſions, for if the Paſſions were Superiour to Reaſon, it is to them that the Praiſe of this Noble Teſtimony to Truth and conſtant Virtue ought to be aſcribed. But ſince this inſtance makes it plain, that the Conflict lay between Reaſon and the Paſſions, and that the former was Victorious, we cannot without great wrong deny, that Reaſon is the Governing Principle in every Man. And ſure it would argue a very perverſe Obſtinacy to pretend the contrary, after ſo full a Demonſtration, not only of Bodily Pains, but likewiſe of Pleaſures too, reſiſted, and vanquiſhed, as hath been produced, ſince it is evident the Tendency of our Paſſions, is conſtantly no other; than to indulge Pleaſure, and to decline Pain.

CH. VII. For in the caſe of this Reverend Father Eleazar, we may imagine Duty, and a good Conſcience to be like a Ship, toſt in a tempeſtuous Sea of Paſſions, while Reaſon like a wiſe and good Pilot, ſat ſteering at the Helm, The Man blown hard and beaten about with a Storm of Menaces and barbarous Uſage, driven down and almoſt ſunk by the ſwelling Surges of Racks and Fires, but ſtill maintaining his Poſt, and not letting the Rudder go, till he had brought his Veſſel into the Haven of a bleſt Immortality. Never did beſieged City make ſuch a Defence againſt the Stratagems and furious Aſſaults of the Enemy that attacked it, as this Holy Perſon, when defending his Soul againſt the Attacks of Stripes, and Tortures, and Death, and routing all that laid Seige to him, by Reaſon engaged in the Cauſe of Religion. The good Father ſet his Mind like a Promontory in the Waters, which ſtood Unſhaken, and broke the Waves of Paſſion when Beating moſt Furiouſly againſt it.

O Prieſt moſt worthy of that Holy Function, who didſt refuſe to defile thy Conſecrated Mouth, and wouldſt not ſuffer that Belly which was a Veſſel of God, and always fed with Hallowed Sacrifices, to receive ſo impure a Mixture, as Meats Unclean by Law, and offered to falſe Gods! O Preacher of the Law, and Maſter of that beſt Philoſophy, which God's own Word hath Taught us; O Noble Pattern ſet to all that ſacrifice with their own Blood, and ſtand up in Vindication of the Law, defending it againſt the Inſults of Paſſion, with generous Sweat and toilſome Conflict! Thou, Holy Father, haſt brought Glory to our excellent Conſtitution by thy Sufferings and Patience, and convinced the World, what mighty Efficacy the Philoſophy which came down from Heaven hath, upon Minds well reſolved not to reproach but to reflect Honour back upon their Holy Profeſſion! O wonderful Old Age ſtronger than Torture! O Zeal hotter than Fire, O thou moſt
Num. XVI. Glorious of all Conquerors who thus haſt led thy Paſſions in Triumph; as heretofore our Father Aaron armed with a Cenſer ran into the midſt of the People, and vanquiſhed the deſtroying Angel who conſumed our Anceſtors by Fire from the Lord: So did Eleazar, deſcended from the ſame Aaron, hold faſt the Dictates of his Mind, and conquer in the midſt of thoſe Flames that devoured his Body round about. And, which is moſt aſtoniſhing, when Age and Infirmities had enervated his outward Man, his inward exerted a moſt Youthful and Invincible Vigour; O happy Old Age! O Venerable Gray Hairs! O Life of Integrity and Sanctity unqueſtionable, when conſummated and atteſted by the Seal of ſuch a Death.

What fuller Evidence can be deſired of the ſway Reaſon bears above the Paſſions, than a Man in Years, deprived of his Natural Strength, more apt to Fear, leſs able to encounter ſevere Trials, enduring ſo much with ſuch undaunted Courage? But leſt the Objector ſhould have it to ſay, that this in Age is leſs to be wondred at, becauſe, as Strength and Courage, ſo the Paſſions and Love of Life too, may then be ſuppoſed to be conſiderably abated: I ſhall proceed to ſhew that even Young Men, whoſe Reaſon hath been well fixt upon true Principles, have undergone, and o-
CH. VIII. vercome, Tortures yet ſharper and more amazing than theſe. For, after the Tyrant had made this Experiment to his loſs, and found himſelf and all his barbarous Stratagems out-done by one Poor Old Man; Enraged at this Defeat, he gave orders to bring ſome others of the Hebrew Captives before him; Promiſing to releaſe them immediately upon Condition they conſented to eat of unclean Meats, but in Caſe of Refuſal, threatning them with greater Cruelties, than any he had yet Inflicted.

In Purſuance of this order there were brought before Him Seven Brethren with their Ancient Mother. The Men were beautiful and well-faſhioned, So charming in their Perſons and Behaviour, that the Tyrant, Fierce as he was, could not forbid himhimſelf being taken with them. And therefore after viewing them with a ſenſible Delight, he ſmil'd upon them, and, Commanding that they ſhould draw near to his Throne, he accoſted them as follows.

" Young Men, I own my ſelf to be an Admirer of your Beauty, and have upon " that account kind Intentions towards you: Nor can I but pay a more than ordina- " ry Reſpect to your Family, which hath the unuſual Bleſſing of ſo many ſuch Bro- " thers as You. To adviſe therefore, that you would not be guilty of the ſame Mad " and moſt Abſurd Zeal, with that Poor Old Bigot, whom you ſaw periſh in the " midſt of Agonies and Tortures, is a Kindneſs far below what I deſign for you. No, " I invite you to comply with me, with an Aſſurance of my Particular Friendſhip. " For I have it in my Power to Oblige and Advance Them that Obey me, in as eminent " a manner, as I have (you ſee) to Puniſh thoſe that ſtand it out againſt my Com- " mands. Take my Word then, you ſhall not fail of Preferments, but have Places " of Honour, and Profit, and Great Truſt in my Affairs, Provided you will Re- " nounce your Country's Cuſtoms, and be content to live after the Greek manner, " laying aſide the fooliſh Diſtinction of Meats, and indulging thoſe Appetites and " Pleaſures freely, in which Youth, never fond of Reſtraint, muſt needs find a De- " light now deny'd you by the Tyranny of your Own Superſtition. Conſider too, " that if ſuch Advantageous Offers be rejected, you muſt expect that your Obſtinacy " will be the more provoking, and I ſhall be oblig'd to make every one of you Ex- " amples, by a Death as full of Pain and Horrour, as the Anger of an Incenſed King " can Inflict. Be perſwaded to pity your own ſelves, when I, a Stranger, and an " Enemy, have ſet you an Example of Pity. Throw not laviſhly away ſo much " Youth and Beauty, which I am very loath ſhould periſh; but periſh it muſt, unleſs " you will ſave it, and for that there is but One way. Therefore conſider well; me- " thinks you ſhould conſider, and not Reſolve too Raſhly, when I aſſure you, that in " caſe of Diſobedience, you have nothing to expect but Racks, and Fires, and Death.

Having thus ſpoken, he called for the Inſtruments of Torture; that by producing Theſe he might work more ſtrongly upon their Fear, than Words and Menaces, He thought, would be able to do. When the Soldiers had ſet before them Wheels, Pullies, Screws, Racks, Winches, Wedges, Iron Gantlets, Boots, Caldrons, Frying-Pans, Bellows, Combuſtible matter, and other ſuch like Engines of Horrour and Execution; The Tyrant taking the advantage of the Impreſſion he ſuppoſed theſe Spectacles would make, applied himſelf to them once more to this effect: " Young " Men, be Wiſe in time, and dread the Weight of an Angry King's Hand; Your " compliance is no longer now a Wilful Offence, and you need not doubt, but the " Juſtice, of that Being you Worſhip, will conſider the hardſhip of your Caſe, and al- " low for the conſtraint you lie under. But neither could his Treacherous Allurements flatter them; nor the Sight of theſe Diſmal Inſtruments of Vengeance affright them out of their Duty. They were ſo far from yielding through Fear, that their Reſolution grew ſtronger, and by the Power of Reaſon they triumphed over his Barbarity; For what can we ſuppoſe would have been the Meaſures taken upon this Occaſion, had there been but any one Perſon timorous, or Inordinately fond of Life in that Number? Would not ſuch a one preſently have Addreſs'd himſelf to the Reſt in a reply like this? What Stupid and Fool-hardy Wretches are we, thus to continue Deaf to the Invitations and kind Advice of a King, who calls us to Gain and Promotion upon our Obedience? Why ſhould we ſupport our ſelves with vain Imaginations, and perſiſt in a Fatal Obſtinacy which can get us nothing but Death? Shall we be ſo inſenſible as to have no regard to theſe Dreadful Engines of Cruelty? None to the Menaces of an Unrelenting Tyrant, brutiſh enough to put in Execution all that he hath threatned? Shall we not rather abandon this Empty Point of Honour, and that falſe Pride of Conſtancy that is certain to prove our Deſtruction? Sure it can be no Crime, to have ſome reſpect to our Youth, which may ſtill ſee many Happy Years; ſome Pity to our Poor Aged Mother, whoſe Gray Hairs muſt be brought down with Unſpeakable Sorrow to the Grave, to ſee ſo many Sons cut off at Once, and Her ſelf made Childleſs in an Inſtant by our Diſobedience! What the King ſays is very Rational, that God is too Juſt and Good not to make Allowance for the hard Circumſtances we lie under; Why ſhould we then throw our ſelves out of Life, at a time when we are beſt fitted to taſt the Sweets of living? Why hurry our ſelves headlong out of a World where every Thing Conſpires to Delight and Entertain us moſt Agreeably? Let us not ſtrive any Longer with our Fate; Nor buy Applauſe ſo dear as at the Expence of Racks and Death. The Law it ſelf is not ſo ſevere as to condemn for Involuntary Offences; And the more Juſt our Fears are, the leſs there is of Will in the compliance. What pretence can we have then for this Reſtiffneſs? Or why ſhould we be ſo fond of a miſtaken Courage, which is indeed no better than Deſpair and Obſtinacy, when nothing but Death is before us, if we ſtand out; and Life and Security, Plenty and Pleaſure are as ſurely Ours, if we ſubmit.

CHAP. IX. But theſe brave Youths, though then in ſight of Death, and Tortures worſe than Death, let no ſuch Words fall, had no ſuch Diſhonourable Thoughts; The Reaſon is, becauſe they had attained to a Maſtery over their Paſſions, and were above Terrour and Pain. So far above them, that as ſoon as the Tyrant had admoniſhed them, (as you have heard) to eat of his Forbidden Meats, they all with one Voice, as if all had been Animated with one and the ſame generous Soul, made him the following Reply.

"To what purpoſe, O King, is this Delay? If with Deſign to known our Final Re- "ſolution; be aſſured we are ready to encounter Death in it's moſt frightful Shape, "rather than Tranſgreſs the Laws of our Fathers. For, beſides the Reverence due to "the Examples of our Anceſtors upon other Accounts, This is what our Obedience "to the Law, and the Precepts of Moſes require from us. Do not then attempt any "more to perſwade us to Apoſtacy; do not put on a Counterfeit Pity for Them who "know you hate them; Even Death it ſelf is more Supportable, than ſuch an inſul- "ting, diſſembling Compaſſion, as would ſave our Lives with the loſs of our Innocence. "Thou thinkeſt to terrify us by Threatnings of Death and Torture, notwithſtanding "the ſame Experiment made upon the Old Man, hath ſo lately taught Thee, how In- "effectual all ſuch Methods are upon the Servants of the True God; and if the Old "Men of our Nation endure ſo Couragiouſly ſuch exquiſite Pains for their Religion; "is it Reaſonable to ſuppoſe that the Young Ones will ſuffer the Reproach of coming "behind them in Conſtancy and Patience? As we have been educated under his Inſtru- "ctions, ſo we ſhall Conquer after his Example. Try us therefore, ſee if it be in thy "Power to deſtroy our Souls, when we ſuffer in the Cauſe of God and Religion. No "Sir; this is Impoſſible, your Cruelty cannot hurt us; for all the effect our Pains can "have will be to ſecure us the glorious rewards due to unſhaken Patience and injured "Virtue. But upon You the conſequence will be very Different and Dreadful, for by "the Murder of ſo many Innocent Men, you Arm the Divine Vengeance againſt your "ſelf, and for the Temporal which you Inflict, will become Obnoxious to Everlaſting "Torments.

This Anſwer ſo enraged the Tyrant, that he reſolved to proceed againſt Them, not only as Diſobedient, but Unthankful Men: And therefore gave the Word, that the Executioners ſhould bring the Eldeſt to the Torture; Which they immediately did, Binding his Hands, Stripping off his Cloaths, and Faſtening his Arms in a Poſture for receiving the Scourge. But finding that they wearied themſelves in vain, and that all their Stripes were to no manner of Purpoſe, they Clap'd him upon the Wheel. The Noble Youth lying extended here with his Bones broken, and every Limb of his Body out of Joint, reproached his Tormenter thus, "O Monſter of Wickedneſs, "Enemy of God and Juſtice, and abandon'd to Cruelty and Rage, thou doſt not treat "me thus inhumanely for Murder or Villany, or for any Breach of Divine or Humane "Laws, but purely for my Zeal to God, and his Holy Ordinances; The Soldiers here- upon exhorted him to conſent, and eat of the King's Meat, that he might deliver himſelf from any further Sufferings. But he returned; "No: You miſtake in ſuppoſing your "Wheel to have gotten the better of me; no, with the crueleſt Inſtruments of barba- "rity you cannot ſtrangle my Mind, nor diſlocate my Reaſon; Cut this Body piece- "meal, burn my Fleſh in the Fire, and ſtretch my yielding Limbs till they crack and fly "aſunder; the exquiſite Malice of your Tortures ſhall convince you, by this Tryal "made upon my Perſon, that it is the peculiar Glory of the Hebrew Nation, to be "invincibly firm in their Sufferings for Virtue and a good Conſcience. Then they put Fire under him; and, drawing the Pullies ſtreighter, turned his Body thus Miſe- rably extended to the Flames. Inſomuch that all the Wheel was beſmeared with Blood, the Coals underneath were put out by his Bowels Dripping into them, and all the Spokes and Pins of the Engine were cover'd with clotted Blood, and Pieces of Fleſh torn off from the Body, till nothing was left of humane Form, but a Skeleton of broken Bones.

Still this Brave Youth and true Son of Faithful Abraham, was never heard to utter one Complaint or Groan; but ſuſtained the Rack with ſuch Magnanimity, as if the Fire had only ſerved to refine him into a Creature Immortal and Impaſſible. At laſt he cryed out, "Be ſure, my Brethren, that you follow this Pattern, Do not "deſert Me in this noble Conflict, nor diſclaim that Relation of generous Conſtancy, "by which we are allied in Soul, more nearly than in Blood. When you engage in "Defence of Religion, it is a Holy and a Glorious Warfare; and never doubt, but "that the Tender Providence of that Father above, Juſt and Gracious, whom we "Worſhip, will not only Reward us, but be Propitious to our Whole Nation, and "certainly

" certainly humble this Haughty Bloody Tyrant, with Puniſhments as uncommon and
" amazing as his own Pride and Cruelty. And thus the Holy Youth ended his Painful Life.

While the Spectators ſtood Aſtoniſh'd at this undaunted Courage, the Guards advanced with the Second Brother. Him they bound faſt to the Pully, and drew on the Iron Gantlets with ſharp Nails: Then, Enquiring whether he would accept the Conditions of Eſcape before they began the Torture; and finding by his Anſwer, that he was in the ſame Noble Reſolution with his Brother, the furious Wild Beaſts fix'd their Iron Gantlets into his Neck, and drew off all the Fleſh from his Muſcles, quite up to the Chin, and Flay'd off all the Hair and Skin of his Beard, Face, and Head. But he bearing this Terrible Pain with great Temper, ſaid, " How welcome is Death
" in any Shape, when a Man ſuffers for Truth and Religion? Art thou not ſenſible,
" thou Brutiſh Tyrant, that thou art now thy Own Tormentor more than Mine?
" the Indignation thou Conceiveſt for having thy Wicked Deſigns defeated, and all " thy Barbarity vanquiſh'd by my Conſtancy in a Good Cauſe, Frets and Gnaws
" thy Soul more than all theſe Pains do Me. For the Pleaſures of Virtue and the " Comforts of a Clear Conſcience, ſoften my Sufferings and ſupport my Spirits. But " thou art Rack'd indeed, with all the Cutting Apprehenſions of a Guilty Mind.
" What I now ſay thy own Breaſt tells thee, that ſo Wicked a Wretch cannot poſſibly eſcape the terrible Vengeance of a Juſt and Angry God.

When this Man too had undergone a Death ſo much to his Honour, the Third was CHAP. X. brought, and preſt hard with Arguments and Entreaties from ſeveral Hands, That he would Eat and Live. To which he Anſwer'd with great Vehemence, " You ſeem not " to know how nearly I am Related to Thoſe that have Died here before me: A" las, the ſame Father and Mother brought us into the World, and the ſame Maſters
" form'd our Minds, and we always acted upon the ſame Principles: And ſhall I then
" in this laſt Scene of Life renounce the Honour of that ſtrict Alliance, to Them,
" whom I have never yet given Occaſion to be aſham'd of calling me Brother? This Anſwer, deliver'd with ſuch an Air of Reſolution and Firmneſs, enrag'd the Executioners; who, to expreſs their Malice and Reſentments, clapp'd his Hands and Feet preſently into the Screws, and with a Violent Wrench put out all the Joints of his Fingers and his Toes at once; This done, they ſtill continu'd to draw the Engine yet higher, till they had Twiſted his Arms and Legs and Shoulder-bones out of their Sockets; and finding him ſurvive all theſe Diſtortions, dragg'd off his Skin at the ends of his Fingers and flay'd him from the very Crown of the Head. Not content to have mangl'd his Body after this mercileſs manner, they dragg'd him to the Wheel, where being yet more diſtended upon the Pins and Screws, he ſaw his ſeveral Parts burſt aſunder, his Fleſh drop off by piece-meals, and his Bowels and Blood guſh out. When he was at the point of Death he cry'd, " O thou moſt Wicked and Inhumane of all Tyrants, We ſuffer thus for the " Religion and Law of a God who is able to reward us; but thou ſhalt ſuffer Pains much " more Inſupportable, much more Inexpreſſible, for thy Impiety and Barbarous Cruelty.

After this Perſon had endured as became a Brother of that Renowned Family, the Fourth was haled to Execution; but perſwaded firſt, That he would bethink himſelf, and be Wiſer than Thoſe that had gone before him. His Anſwer was, " You cannot " Heat your Fires ſo much hotter for Me, as to make me a Coward after ſo Noble
" Patterns of Martyrdom already before my Eyes; nor will I ſtain the Honour of my " Blood. Try me, Thou Tyrant, and let all thy Tortures prove, whether I be not " a Branch of the ſame Stock, and Animated with the very ſame Soul, with thoſe
" whoſe Blood Thy Impious Hands have Spilt, and Torn them Limb from Limb, but " all in vain, with all the Horrour and Pain, that Malice and Deviliſh Rage could " contrive. The Savage and moſt Profligate Antiochus, incens'd at this, commanded immediately to cut out his Tongue. Whereupon he proceeded, "Ah, how Im-
" pertinent a Cruelty is this! 'tis to great purpoſe that you take away the Organ of " Speech, from One who truſts in a God that ſeeth the Heart, and hears the In" ward Motions of them that are ſilent. Here, it is ready for your Inſtruments, looſe
" to your Hand; but know, when you have cut it out, you cannot do the ſame
" Execution upon my Reaſon, nor make my Mind Dumb. O that I could be ſo
" Happy to loſe my Life by Inches, and Glorifie God with every Member and Joint " of my Body, by having them Maim'd, and Lopp'd off One by One for his Cauſe and " Glory. But as for Thee, Guilt and Vengeance will quickly overtake Thee, who " cutteſt out theſe Inoffenſive Tongues, that are imploy'd in making Melody, and " ſinging Praiſes to the God who Form'd their Speech.

No ſooner had this Brother, Exhauſted with Pain, and miſerably mangled, finiſh- CHAP. XI.
ed his Courſe, but the Fifth ſprung forward of his own accord, crying out, " To " ſhew Thee, Tyrant, what Impreſſions theſe Tortures make upon Me, ſee here I " come, not content to wait thy Tedious Orders, offering My Self to the Tryal, and

" deſirous to loſe no Time in ſo Noble an Exerciſe of Virtue. The Sooner thou " Diſpatcheſt me, the Sooner ſhall my Bliſs, and thy Iniquities be full; and I ſhall " help to make thee Ripe for Vengeance, by adding One more to the Number of " them whoſe Innocent Blood thou haſt ſhed. Tell me, thou Devourer of Mankind, " and Enemy of all Goodneſs, What could provoke, what poſſeſs Thee, to deſtroy " us after this Mercileſs, Inſulting Manner? Is it become a Capital Crime for Men to " devote themſelves to the Service of the Great Creator of the World, and make a " Conſcience of Governing their Actions, by an Excellent Law of his Preſcribing? " No ſure, this Conduct ought not to expoſe men to Tortures, but Entitle Them " to Rewards and Honours. While theſe Words were yet in his Mouth, the Soldiers dragg'd him down, and bound him to the Pullies; to which, when they had ſcrew'd in his Knees, they clapt on Iron Footlocks, and drawing the Screws, diſlocated his Loins, ſo that he lapp'd round the Wheel like a Snake; and being Diſjointed all over, had his Bones broken in an Inſtant. Thus being almoſt Strangled, and in Unſpeakable Anguiſh by the Stoppage of his Breath, and Bodily Pain, he ſaid, " Full ſore againſt thy Will thou Conferreſt on us Favours, which were never " intended: For the more Exquiſite our Torments are, the Nobler Proof thou giv'ſt " Occaſion for of Patience Invincible, and Stedfaſtneſs in our Religion.

When He was Dead, the Sixth Youth was preſently brought forward; and, being ask'd by the Tyrant, Whether he would accept Deliverance? he Reply'd, " Though I " in Years come behind Them that ſuffered before me, yet is my Soul of Equal Ma- " turity with Theirs. For in regard our Deſcent and Education was the ſame, 'tis " fit, that ſince the Cauſe we are call'd to aſſert is the ſame, our Death ſhould like- " wiſe be the ſame. If then thou art diſpos'd to put me upon the ſame Tryals, " know, that I will take care to die Innocent, and keep the Support of a good Con- " ſcience under my Torture. Hereupon they faſten'd him to the Wheel, and, after having broken and diſtorted all his Bones, put Fire under him; then did the Soldiers heat Spits and Spears Red Hot, and thruſt them into his Back and Sides, till his very Bowels and Intrails were burnt up. While he cry'd out, " O Glorious Con- " flict, in which ſo many Brethren have engag'd for their Religion, and all come " off with Conqueſt. For a Mind rightly Inform'd in the Truth, and arm'd with " Steady Principles of Vertue, muſt ever be Impregnable. I will bear my Brethren " Company in ſo Noble a Death, and add to the Number of the Plagues due to " Thee, O wicked Inventor of Artful Cruelty, and Implacable Foe of all that adhere " to the True Religion. Six of Us now have baffled thy Malice and Rage; for I muſt " needs Account thee Baffled, when ſo much hath been done without any Succeſs, " to force us to forgo our Duty and comply with thy Wicked Propoſals. Thy " Fires, methinks, are cold; thy Racks eaſie; and thy Guards are now no longer " Tormentors and Executioners, but Defenders and Promoters of our Law and its " Honour; ſince they aſſiſt us in giving Teſtimony to It, and Contribute to the Tri- " umphs of the Religion they are not able to ſuppreſs.

CH. XII. When this Man had made ſo Bleſſed an End, being diſpatch'd at laſt, by caſting him into a Cauldron of boyling Liquor, the Seventh and Youngeſt appear'd; whom, when the Tyrant ſaw Fetter'd and Pinion'd, though ſo implacably Outrageous againſt the Reſt of his Brethren, his Hard Heart began a little to Relent. Calling him therefore up near to the Tribunal where he ſat, he began to try him by Soft Words, and Fair Means. " You ſee (ſaid he) Young Man, the Miſerable End, which " the Reſt of Your Family have by their Own Obſtinate Folly brought Themſelves " to: For all theſe Tortures and Tragical Spectacles of Death, are indeed the Con- " ſequences of their Own Wilfulneſs and Diſobedience; and the ſame will be thy " Fate in a very few Minutes, if their Examples have not made thee Wiſer. But I " hope better things, and for an Encouragement of thy better Behaviour, do make " thee here a Generous Proffer of my Love and Particular Friendſhip, and promiſe " to promote thee in my Kingdom to Places of very great Eminence and Profit. Not content with theſe Perſwaſions to the Son, he Addreſs'd himſelf to the Mother alſo, with a ſeeming Compaſſion for her Loſs, and Entreating her to prevail upon her Child, in Pity to Her at leaſt, to ſave this ſmall Remnant of the Family, and not to give her the Affliction of having all her Off-ſpring ſo ſadly torn away at once. But He, Receiving from his Mother in the Hebrew Language, the Advice which I ſhall mention hereafter, cry'd out all on the ſudden, " Well then, unbind me, and let me " have Liberty to Apply to the King, and his Friends that attend about the Throne. The Company was overjoy'd at this Propoſal, and immediately let him looſe; which He taking the Advantage of, ran haſtily to the ſide of the Cauldrons and Frying-Pans, and ſaid; " Thou moſt Ungodly Tyrant, and Unparallell'd Monſter of Baſe- " neſs and Villany; that haſt receiv'd from the Hand of God a Kingdom, and ſo

" many

" many Bleſſings of this World; and yet, without the leaſt Degree of Shame or Re-
" morſe, murdereſt the Servants and Friends of him who Thus Advanc'd Thee. Is " this the Requital thou mak'ſt to a Bountiful God, to Rack and Torture thoſe that
" Worſhip him; and for no other Reaſon, but becauſe they Worſhip him as he him-
" ſelf hath directed? Be well aſſur'd, this ſhall not be forgotten; but Juſtice will
" purſue and find thee out; and in the mean while lays up in Store for Thee Tor-
" ments and Fires, not like Thine here, that quickly conſume the Body, and the " more Fierce they are the ſooner they end our Pain; but thoſe ſhall be a Trea-
" ſure of Fire Inexhauſtible, of Pains which whole Ages will not end, but Freſh
" and Fiercer continually, till Time ſhall be no more. Art thou a Man, thou
" Wretch, more Savage than the Wildeſt of Brutes! and haſt thou no Regard, no
" manner of Relenting for theſe moſt Exquiſite, and Studied Pains, of them, who " have the ſame Nature, the ſame Tender Senſe of Sufferings with thy ſelf? Is it
" poſſible a Creature of like Matter and Form, ſhould take Delight in Mangling,
" Burning, Flaying, Scourging, Killing, his Fellow-Creatures? Yet ſuch it ſeems
" art Thou, unlike indeed to us in Diſpoſition, and as unlike in thy Fate and " Portion. For We who Die to Feaſt Thy Malice, have done our Duty, and ſhall
" find Favour and Happineſs with God; but Thou, whoſe Cruelty hath put theſe
" ſtout Champions of the Truth upon vindicating it with ſo much cauſeleſs
" Pain, ſo undeſerved a Death, ſhalt Howl for ever in Deſpair; and, when too late,
" Curſe and be Plagu'd with the Bitter Reproaches of this Guilty Day's Tranſacti-
" ons. So Dreadful, ſo Infamous is thy Caſe; ſo Bleſſed, ſo Glorious my Martyr'd
" Brethren; whoſe Honours and Rewards, think not, that either Flattery or Fear ſhall
" exclude me from; for know, I aſpire to an Equality with the Beſt of Them, and " think it Long and Loſt Time, till we meet again in the ſame Sufferings here, and " the ſame Bliſs Above. With that he caſt himſelf into the Pans, and expir'd in the hotteſt of the Fire.

CH. XIII. And will it now admit of any Diſpute, Whether Reaſon guided and ſupported by Religion have the Superintendency over the Paſſions, when we ſee Seven Brothers, in perfect Agreement, and upon the ſame Principles, vanquiſhing and deſpiſing the moſt exquiſite Pains and Death? Is it not manifeſt, that, had theſe Men been govern'd by their Paſſions, they had ſubmitted to Pollute themſelves with Unlawful Meats; refus'd no Conditions to procure Eaſe and Safety; and been (what all the World muſt have call'd them) Subdu'd? But now the Face of Things is quite otherwiſe; They Shine and Reign Triumphant; Their Paſſions were abſolutely Quell'd, Reaſon aſſerted its Dominion, and for ſo doing receiv'd Praiſe of God. Nor is it poſſible to conſider this whole Proceeding without ſeeing and acknowledging the Superiority of the Mind, and the entire Defeat of all the Attempts made upon it, by Paſſion and Pain. How great a Wrong would it be, to deny theſe Martyrs the Trophies of this Bloody Field, and not allow them the Character of Men proceeding magiſterially by the Rules of Right Reaſon, when they had their Paſſions in ſuch perfect Subjection, that even the Extremity of Fires and Racks could not give theſe Paſſions ſtrength enough to Rebel? For as the Moles and Forts upon the Shore break all the Force of the Waves and Weather, and render the Harbour Commodious and Safe to Ride in; ſo did this Seven-fold Fortification of Reaſon protect the Port of Duty and Religion, from all the Storms and boiſterous Inundations of Paſſion.

How Moving, how Noble a Sight was ſuch a Company, Encouraging and Aſſiſting each other in the Exerciſe of their Piety, like the Voices which contribute every one by his Diſtinct Part to make up a Perfect Melody? With ſuch a Harmony of of Hearts, did they call out; Come, my Brethren, let us Remember who we are, and in what Cauſe we Fight, and let us ſtand it out for our God and his Law, by dying like True Brothers. Did not the Three Brave Youths in Aſſyria defy the Furnace of the King of Babylon, and to what purpoſe have we thoſe Examples, if they do not provoke us to a Generous Imitation? Dan. iii.

When Religion and a Good Conſcience are at ſtake, let us abandon all ignoble Fears, and act with Reſolution becoming ſo Glorious a Cauſe; One cry'd out, Courage, my Dear Brother; another, Perſevere Bravely; a Third, Remember who you are, and from what Anceſtors you Sprung; Abraham was your Father, who was content with his Own Hand, to Sacrifice his Son; and Iſaac, who as willingly Submitted to be Slain by that Father's Hand. And all in General, looking on each other with Countenances Serene and highly pleaſed; all Stout and Recollected in their Own Minds, cry'd out, Come and let us Chearfully Conſecrate our Souls to our God. Let us thus pay him back the Lives he lent us for his Service; and give up Theſe Bodies for the Uſe and Defence of his moſt Holy Law. Why ſhould we ſtand in Fear of One, who only ſeems to kill the Body? The only Danger worthy of our Dread is that of Souls abandon'd to

Torments

Torments Everlaſting, and that can never be the ſad Fate of ſuch as Keep and Honour, but of them only who Tranſgreſs and Forſake the Truth. Let us then Arm our ſelves with a Holy Fortitude; ſo ſhall Abraham, and Iſaac, and Jacob receive us when we Die: So ſhall all our Pious Anceſtors Congratulate and Applaud our Conſtancy.

And as they were dragg'd One by One to Execution, They whoſe Turn was not yet come, Encourag'd thoſe that went before them thus; Take heed, my Brother, how thou demeaneſt thy ſelf, and be ſure to do nothing that may diſgrace either thoſe of Our Number that have gone before Thee, or Us who are about to tread in the ſame Steps. Theſe muſt needs have been very Engaging Exhortations: For none of my Readers can be inſenſible, what Charms, what Powerful Influence ſo near a Relation carries with it; what tender Affections the All-wiſe Providence hath infus'd into their Hearts, who have deriv'd their Subſtance from the ſame Father, and lay in the Womb of the ſame Mother, where every Brother found the ſame Receptacle, dwelt the ſame Term of Time, and was form'd into Man by the ſame Proceſs of Nature; Perſons nouriſh'd by the ſame Blood, and brought to due Maturity by the ſame Informing Soul; afterwards Sucking the ſame Milk, Suſtained at one Common Table, Converſing perpetually under the ſame Roof, Educated by the ſame Care, Inſtructed by the ſame Teachers, and Initiated in the ſame Religion. And ſuch was the Affection, ſuch the Endearments, and conſequently, of ſuch Weight and Efficacy the Admonitions and Mutual Encouragements, of theſe Seven Brethren to One Another: For they were brought up in the ſame Faith, Train'd up in the Exerciſe of the ſame Virtues; and, the better Men they were, the better ſtill muſt they needs love each other. For Natural Affection is never ſo happily improv'd, as by perfect Agreement in Goodneſs and United Zeal in the Love and Service of God: And as each of theſe would love the Reſt more tenderly in proportion as himſelf was more Religious, ſo would he neceſſarily, in the ſame Proportion, and upon the ſame Account, become more worthy to be Belov'd by all the Reſt. And yet we may Obſerve in this very Caſe a mighty Conqueſt of Reaſon over Paſſion; for though theſe Brethren had all the tender Concern, that Nature and Blood, Birth and Education, Acquaintance and Perſonal Worth could Inſpire them with; yet were theſe manifold Endearments ſo vanquiſh'd and born down, when Religion and their Souls lay at Stake; that in a Cauſe ſo Noble, the very Tortures and Agonies, and Deaths of their Deareſt Relations, gave a Senſible Satisfaction to thoſe of the Number, who yet ſurviv'd, and were the Undaunted, nay, even Pleas'd Spectators of them.

CH. XIV. Thus did they by theſe Exhortations to Endure the Torture, not only work themſelves up to a Contempt of Pains, but ſubdue Brotherly Affection, and the Tendereſt and moſt Prevailing Part of Human Nature it ſelf. O Minds more Abſolute than the moſt Sovereign Princes, more Free and Noble than the Nobleſt Birth could make them! Not One of theſe Generous Youths expreſs'd the leaſt Fear, not One made the leaſt Demurr; but without ſhrinking back at Death and all its moſt Horrible Pomp, they made the beſt of their way to Racks and Fires, as Men that were Running the Race of Immortality, and impatient, with the utmoſt ſpeed poſſible, to come up to the Goal. And as the Hands and Feet, and other Members of our Body do with all Alacrity and Eaſe imaginable move as the Soul dictates and directs; ſo ready, ſo perfectly agreed and uniform in all their Motions towards Death, were theſe Heroick Youths, puſh'd on by the Principle of Religion, which like One Common Soul animated them all. O Heavenly Conſtellation of Seven Conſenting Brethren! For, as the Seven Days in which the World was Created, give us the Idea of God, and ſhew the Perfection of his Majeſty and Goodneſs; ſo do theſe Seven Renowned Martyrs, by running the whole Circle of Pains and Tortures, compoſe one finiſh'd Piece of Conſtancy and Courage, and teach us that Perfection of Fortitude, which baniſhes the Slaviſh Fear of Death. But alas! how far ſhort of this Pattern do we ſtop, We, who cannot now ſo much as Read or Hear without Trembling and Amazement what they not only heard, not only ſaw, but felt and bore it all without the leaſt Diſorder of Mind!

What can be more Inſupportable than Fire, that pierces and ſeparates, and conſumes in an Inſtant? Yet the Acuteſt Pains apply'd to their Parts moſt Tender and of Quickeſt Senſe, did theſe Stout Champions conſtantly endure.

Nay, to encreaſe our Wonder more, and abate that Notion of Fortitude, which Men too Partial to themſelves are apt to boaſt of as the Peculiar Glory of their Own Sex, I ſhall make good my Aſſertion concerning the Sovereignty of Reaſon over the Paſſions, by a moſt aſtoniſhing Inſtance of a Woman: One exercis'd by Sufferings more Sharp, more Complicated, than any of thoſe hitherto mention'd. For Who can Conceive the Extremity, the Variety of that Pious Mother's Pains, who her ſelf was tortur'd and put to death in every One of her Seven Sons? Do but reflect how the the Bowels and Natural Affection of Parents does Terminate, and draw them as it were to their Children as to the proper Center of all their Care and Concern. This is what we obſerve even in Brute Beaſts, which ſeldom or never fail to expreſs a Tenderneſs to their Young, equal to that among Men. But why do I ſpeak of Beaſts, when all Nature is full of it, and even the Ignobler Species of Creatures want not a Viſible and Strange Kindneſs for their Own Breed: For even the Bees themſelves, when Intent upon the Buſineſs of Waxing, Guard and Defend their Hives, and, as oft as the Drones Invade them, know how to make their Stings do the Office of Swords and other Military Weapons, in Revenge of the Wrong done by thoſe that would Attack their Little Ones.

But ſo true a Daughter of Abraham was the Mother of theſe Gallant Youths, that CH. XV. even Compaſſion for her Own Children could not break in upon her Duty. Such was her Noble Zeal, that when two things were offer'd to her Choice, Religion, and the Preſent Safety and great Preferment of Seven Sons, ſhe wiſely gave the Preference to Religion, took God's Word before the King's, and choſe to have them live for ever with him in Heaven, rather than enjoy a ſhort Proſperity with Antiochus upon Earth. What Words ſhall I find to deſcribe thoſe Tender Paſſions of Parents, that Strange Union between Them and their Children in Nature, which after a wonderful manner, draws upon their Off-ſpring the ſame Lines and Features of Body, and Impreſſes the ſame Diſpoſitions of Soul? How ſhall I tell the Concern they feel for theſe Images and Parts of Themſelves, when in any manner of Diſtreſs? How, eſpecially, that of Mothers, whoſe Weaker Minds and Natural Exceſs of Fondneſs render them ſtill more ſenſibly touch'd with whatever affects their Children, than Fathers are wont or expected to be? And even this Mother was not leſs, nay, ſhe was much more under the Influence of this Affection than Common Mothers: Seven Painful Births had made as many Additions to this Love, and every time her Travail was repeated it was a freſh Exerciſe of it, a freſh and ſtronger Endearment to all ſhe had endured the ſame Pangs for.

But all this notwithſtanding the Fear and Love of God overlookt the preſent Eaſe and Advantage of her Children. And never did ſhe Love them ſo tenderly, ſo deſervedly, as when their Steady Virtue, and Conſtancy in the Truth, charm'd her Affections, and endear'd them to her: For they were Juſt and Wiſe, Temperate and Magnanimous, Affectionate to each other; and Dutiful to their Mother to that Degree, that they even died in the Cauſe of their Law, in Obedience to Her. For ſhe was ſo far from allowing any one of theſe manifold Engagements to betray her into an undue Tenderneſs, or ſuffering any of the yet more manifold Tortures inflicted upon her Children to ſhake her Reaſon; that, Mother tho' ſhe was, ſhe earneſtly exhorted each of her Children ſingly, and all of them together, not to decline any Sufferings or Death for the ſake of Religion.

O Nature, Common Mother of us all; O Parents Love unaccountably engaging our Souls; O Anxious Care of Tender Infants! O Sympathy of Mothers irreſiſtible! See here a Prodigy, Seven Children One by One, Rack'd, Burnt, Fry'd, a Mother ſtanding by and looking on, and yet, ſo firm her Piety, not chang'd by the Killing Spectacle; She ſaw the Fleſh of her own Sons Broyling in the Fire; the Joints of their Hands and Feet torn off, and ſtill Trembling and Panting on the Ground, when rent from the Body; the Skins of their Heads and Faces drawn off like Vizards, and caſt down at her Feet; All this the Wondrous Woman ſaw Unmov'd. O Mother, now in Agonies and Racking Pains for thy Children, compar'd with which thy Bearing Throws were Eaſie! O Woman, who of all thy Sex ſeemeſt alone to have brought forth Conſummate Virtue: Thy Firſt-born when Expiring did not ſhake thee, nor thy Second Son, when caſting upon thee a Litious Languiſhing Look, nor thy Third, when Groaning out his Soul; nor the Eyes that ſtarted out of every One of their Heads with Extremity of Pain and Setting in Death; Thou didſt not let one Tear fall, when one Hand was cut off after another, one Head flay'd after another, one Corpſe fell upon another, and Heaps of thy own Fleſh lay before thee. The Songs of Syrens and the Dying Notes of Swans make not ſo Melodious Muſick, as did in thy Ears the laſt Accents of thy own Off-ſpring, calling to thee in the midſt of their Torments Unconceivable, and Dying Agonies. For in thy Soul when warm Debates aroſe, and Nature and Affection pleaded ſtrongly, and the Pains and Unparallell'd Sufferings of thy Children added Weight to their Arguments; yet ſtill thou turnedſt the Deaf Ear; and when thou wert urged moſt Vehemently to give Sentence for thy Children's Life, would'ſt not accept a ſhort Deliverance with Guilt, but gaveſt them up to Death in proſpect of a more laſting Bliſs. Then didſt thou approve thy ſelf a True Daughter of Abraham, an Heireſs of all his Faith and Fortitude. O Mother of a Family, Zealous for the Law, Bulwark of True Religion, and laden with the Conqueſts won by thy own Bowels! O Woman of Generoſity and Patience more Manly than the Stouteſt of Men!

Glory

Glory of thy Own Sex, and Exceller of Ours! For, as the Ark of Noah, which then contain'd all the Surviving World, Rode Triumphant upon the Waters of the General Flood; ſo Thou, whoſe Breaſt included all True Piety, wert toſt upon the Waves of all manner of Contending Paſſions, and beaten upon with the Boiſterous Winds of Torments that blew hard from every Quarter, and yet didſt bravely Weather out the Storm, ſupported by thy Zeal for God and Religion.

CH. XVI. Now then (to return to the point I am all this while aiming at,) If an Old Woman, and the Mother of Seven Children, could not only ſuſtain, but ſee thoſe Children dying in ſuch Miſery, in Conſideration of the Cauſe they ſuffered, and died for; the Conſequence is unavoidable, That Reaſon ſupported by Religion hath a Power ſuperiour to our Paſſions. And that this is the Caſe of Humane Nature in general. I have made it plain, becauſe not only Men have conquer'd their Paſſions, but a Woman hath perfectly ſubdued and deſpiſed the moſt Exquiſite Sufferings. The Lions into whoſe Den Daniel was caſt, were Tame, the Furnace of Miſael, tho' heated ſeven times hotter than uſual, was Cool, in compariſon of thoſe fierce Paſſions, that Fire which Natural Affection and Pity had kindled in her Breaſt, when ſhe ſaw Seven Sons ſucceſſively expire in Agonies inexpreſſible. And yet Reaſon and Religion quenched all the Rage of theſe ſo furious ſo manifold Affections.

For is it not Rational to ſuppoſe, that had this Woman had the leaſt Allay of Puſillanimity in her Temper, all the Mother would have burſt out in Lamentations and doleful Complaints, like theſe? O moſt unfortunate Creature, and expoſed to an unparallell'd variety of Miſeries, who was lately happy in Seven Sons, but am now no longer a Mother! O my Seven unprofitable Travails, O the loſt Cares of Nurſing, which have nouriſhed Children only for Racks, and Fires, and Deaths unexampled! In vain, my Dears, have I been in Pangs for you, in vain endured the many Anxious Days and Reſtleſs Nights, the Coſt and Labour of a Painful Education. O thoſe belov'd Children, whoſe Faces I ſhall never ſee more, nor rejoyce in their Marriage and Poſterity! nor have the ſo much valued Bleſſing of being eſteem'd Happy in my Deſcendants of the Second and Third Generation. And yet I once was Happy, Happy above my Neighbours, both in the Number and the Goodlineſs of the Branches that ſprang from this Fruitful Vine; But now a wretched ſolitary Widow, deſtitute of ſo much as One out of my many Sons, to comfort and aſſiſt me while living, or to bury me when dead.

But the Piety of this Excellent Mother diſdained ſuch Effeminate Complaints, and was ſo far from deſiring any of her Children to live, that it would have been matter of Grief to her, had they not Died as they did. Her Mind firm and impenetrable as a Rock, conſidered that this was to bring forth over again a Numerous Off-ſpring, by a New and better Birth to a Life of Immortality. And therefore ſhe her ſelf beſought them to fulfil her Joy, and encouraged them in Dying for the Cauſe of Religion. O Noble Matron, who liſtedſt thy ſelf in the Service of the ſame Cauſe, and didſt aſſiſt in engaging the Tyrant and approve thy ſelf mighty in Deeds and in Words! For when thou wert apprehended with thy Sons, and an Eye-witneſs of the Tortures and Dolorous Death of the Good Eleazar, then didſt thou in the Hebrew Tongue excite the Courage of thy Sons, by ſaying, See here, my Children, what a Glorious Conflict is this! And if you alſo be called to the like, conſider what a Teſtimony, what an Honour it will be to our Nation, but eſpecially conſider the Law of your Fathers you are to ſuffer for, and be ſure to behave your ſelves in this Encounter valiantly and chearfully. What a Reproach ought you to think it upon the Vigour of your Age, if an Old Man, weakened and ſpent by Years and Infirmities already, did yet endure ſuch Variety, ſuch Extremity of Tortures for his Duty, and thoſe who have all the Fire of Youth to excite and ſupport their Zeal, ſhould ſhrink back at, or ſink under the ſame Tryals! Conſider, my dearer Parts of my ſelf, what Life is, and whence you had it. God gave it you at firſt, The Goodneſs of his Providence hath continued it to you ever ſince. It is therefore his due, and what you ought to pay, when he calls for it again. Can you decline any ſort of Pain for Him in Obedience to whom our Father Abraham made no delay to Sacrifice his Son, the promiſed Father of our Nation? Nor did that Son tremble or once give back, when he ſaw a Father's Hand arm'd with the Weapon of Death, and lifted up to give the fatal Stroke. Was not the Innocent and Pious Daniel, by his own Conſent, caſt as a Prey to Hungry Lions; And the Three Children into a Fiery Furnace? Theſe all endured manfully for the ſake of God, and You who are partakers of the ſame Faith, ought not to ſhrink if you are made partakers of the ſame Sufferings. For indeed it is moſt abſurd for them who have a true Sence of Religion, to betray a Cowardly Degeneracy of Mind in any Difficulties that it ſhall engage them in. Thus did the Mother of Seven Children hearten every one of the Number, and repreſent to them, the Reaſonableneſs, the Neceſſity of Dying, rather than baſely yield to violate any one Command of their God, eſpecially when aſſuredly perſwaded, that they who die for Him, continue ſtill to live with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, and all the Godly Patriarchs in Manſions of Immortal Felicity. Some der to Execution, ſhe prevented all Attempts upon her Perſon, and without Force caſt her ſelf into the Fire. O Glorious Mother, thus defeating the Tyrant's Rage and Violence, diſappointing all his Wicked Contrivances, and exerting a moſt Vigorous and Noble Faith, firm as a ſtrong built Houſe, erected upon her Seven Pillars, and Proof againſt all Shocks that laboured to overturn it! Take Comfort, Holy Matron, whoſe Patience was ſupported by a firm Truſt in God, and well aſſured Hope of future Reward. The Moon encircled with her Retinue of Stars, ſhines not ſo bright in the Firmament of Heaven, as doſt Thou, reflecting Light upon, and receiving it back again from thy Seven Illuſtrious Sons, fix'd in the Heavenly Manſions, and Honourable in the preſence of God. Thy Race were truly Abraham's, and every one a Genuine Son of the Father of the Faithful. Were it a poſſible Undertaking, to draw this whole Action as in a Picture, and relate every Circumſtance in true and lively Colours, our Paſſions ſcarcely could ſuſtain the meer Repreſentation: Nor would the Mother and her Children, expiring in ſuch Cruel Variety of Torments, be ſeen but in ſuch Deſcription without Horrour. And were a Monument, as they well deſerve, to be erected, for a never-dying Memorial to the Nation they are ſo great an Honour to, this or ſome like Inſcription might become it: Here lies a Reverend Old Prieſt, an Ancient Mother, and Seven Gallant Sons, put to Death by the Rage of a Tyrant, attempting, but in vain, to overthrow the Jewiſh Law and Conſtitution: For theſe brave Champions ſtood in the Gap, aſſerted the Rights and Religion of their Nation, committed themſelves and their Cauſe to God, and perſevered in deſpight of Torments and Death. For indeed the Encounter was truly Divine; Virtue was in this Caſe the Judge of the Combate, and Diſpoſer of the Prize; and Patience was the Proof and Exerciſe. To this the Victory was to be adjudged, and Immortality and Bliſs Eternal were the Rewards of them that conquer'd.

The firſt that march'd into this Bloody Field, was Eleazar; The Mother of Seven Sons offer'd her ſelf likewiſe to the Combat; Her Sons ſucceſſively undertook the Conflict; The Adverſary they Encounter'd was the Tyrant, The Ring of Spectators was the World; and the Conquerour Religion; who both Vanquiſh'd in their Perſons, and Crown'd her Champions that fought ſo gallantly in her Vindication. And Who indeed could ſee, who can hear the Noble Atchievements of theſe Heroick Souls, ſo Zealous for the Law of God, without (I ſay not Approbation and Praiſe, but) Wonder and Aſtoniſhment? Nay, even the Tyrant and his Impious Aſſeſſors, that counſell'd and countenanc'd the Barbarous Executioners, could not without Amazement obſerve that Invincible Patience which ſuſtain'd them; and in deſpight of all their Inhumanity and obſtinate Prejudice, rever'd the Piety they labour'd in vain to corrupt.

So true is that of Moſes, All his Saints are in thy Hand. For theſe Men being Sancti- Deut. xxxiii.
fied, as an Offering to God, are celebrated with Honour and Immortal Renown. Nor 3. was the Benefit of their Noble Tryals confin'd to their own Perſons; but the Blood of thoſe Righteous Men ſhed upon this Occaſion, was accepted by God as a Propitiatory Sacrifice, inclin'd him to return to his People in Mercy, and by a Gracious Providence deliver Iſrael from the heavy Load of Oppreſſion they then groaned under. For even Antiochus, conſidering the wonderful Virtue and Reſolution of theſe Men, and their Inflexible Conſtancy under Hardſhip and Pain, gave Teſtimony to their Valour, and by a publick Officer propounded it as a Pattern fit to be imitated by all his own Soldiers. Not only ſo, but taking his Meaſures of the whole Nation by theſe few, he liſted many of them in his Service, employ'd them both in Sieges and Pitch'd Battels, and, having obtain'd many Signal Victories by their Aſſiſtance, learn'd by his own Experience, That Religion inſpires Men with the trueſt Courage, and that None are capable of ſerving their Prince in the Wars, comparably to thoſe Undaunted and Generous Contemners of Life, who dare to encounter Death and Tortures for God and a Good Conſcience. O Race of Faithful Abraham, and Inheritors of his Zeal; ye Seed of Iſrael the Beloved; Set your ſelves to obſerve and pay due Reverence to this Divine Law, to govern your Affections in all Points according to it and live up to the Perfection of Its Dictates and Diſcipline, whoſe mighty Efficacy is ſo undeniable, and its Glory ſo conſpicuous in ſuch unparallell'd Inſtances of Reaſon thus conducted, attaining to an Abſolute Maſtery over the Paſſions.

Nor does this Maſtery extend only to thoſe Inward Diſorders which raiſe a Tumult CH. XVIII.
in our own Breaſts, but, as theſe Examples of Men delivering themſelves willingly to the Torture for the ſake of their Religion make it exceeding plain, to Afflictions from without alſo, and the acuteſt Bodily Pains. Thus did theſe Noble Heroes fight and conquer, and (for acquitting themſelves ſo gallantly) were not only commended and admir'd of Men, but largely rewarded by God. Nor did they vanquiſh Death and Torments only, but alſo the Enemies that inflicted both: by reſtoring Peace to their Nation, and bringing into Requeſt again, the Regard for that long neglected Law, the Contempt whereof provok'd God to ſcourge the People with, this worſt of all Calamities, the Tyrant Antiochus. But while he became an Inſtrument of Vengeance to others, he treaſur'd up yet more againſt himſelf. For, finding all his Efforts to no purpoſe, and that neither Flattery nor Force could draw the Jews to abandon their Own and conform to Foreign Cuſtoms, he drew off from Jeruſalem and made War upon the Perſians, and long it was not e're the Juſtice of God overtook him, even upon Earth by a moſt miſerable Death.

But ſtill to do all right to that wonderful Woman, I ſhall add here ſome other of her pious Exhortations to her no leſs wonderful Sons. Conſider, ſaid ſhe, the Converſation of your Mother, who lived a long time a chaſt unſpotted Virgin; I never wander'd from my Father's Houſe, nor did any luſtful corrupter of Youth aſſault me in the Field, nor that Serpent which ſeduced Eve tempt me into any impure Embraces. The Flower of my Age I paſt in the ſtricteſt Conjugal Fidelity to my Husband. When You, my Children, were grown up, your Father died, happy in the Eſteem of all that knew him. He had the Satisfaction of many proſperous Children, and eſcap'd the Misfortune of ſeeing himſelf depriv'd of theſe Bleſſings. While he continued with you, no Pains were ſpared to inſtill pious Principles, and furniſh you with Inſtructions proper to prepare you for the Trying Difficulties of this Important Day. He taught you with great Diligence the Law and the Prophets; he ſet before you the Renowned Examples of Patience, and ſuffering Virtue. Abel murdered by his own Brother Cain; and Iſaac deſigned for a Burnt-Offering; and Joſeph impriſoned for his Obſtinate Chaſtity; and Phineas zealous for the Law of his God. He preached to you the Virtues and the Glorious Rewards of Ananias, Azarias, and Miſael, and Daniel caſt into the Den of Lions. He frequently put you in mind of that preſerving Providence to thoſe that are God's; which Eſaias magnifies in theſe words: When thou paſſeſt through the Waters, I will be with thee, and through the Rivers, they ſhall not overflow thee; when thou walkeſt through the Fire, thou ſhalt not be burnt, neither ſhall the Flame kindle upon thee. He taught your Infant Tongues that Song of David; Great are the Troubles of the Righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of all; And call'd upon you to obſerve that Maxim of Solomon in his Proverbs, That Wiſdom is a Tree of Life to all that obey and lay hold on her. He quicken'd up your Faith by that Paſſage in Ezekiel, Shall theſe dry Bones live? Nor did he forget to teach you that Heavenly Song of Moſes, who ſays in the Perſon of God; I kill and make alive: And again pronounces of the Law and the diligent obſervance of it; This is your Life and the prolonging of your Days.

O Doleful Day, and yet not Doleful but Glorious rather, when the Mercileſs Grecian Tyrant kindl'd his Impious Fires, heated his Murdering Cauldrons, and with ungodly Rage, more hot and fierce than both, dragg'd and bound to the Engines of Torture, and exercis'd with all manner of Agonies and Pains, the Seven-fold Offſpring of this Daughter of Abraham! When he bor'd out their Eyes, cut out their Tongues, and put them to death, with all the ſtudied Cruelties that Wickedneſs and Malice could invent. Theſe Impious Barbarities the Juſtice of God did then, and always will avenge upon the proud Inflictors; But theſe Sons of Abraham, with their Victorious Mother, are, by a very different Fate, tranſlated from Miſery to Bliſs unſpeakable, admitted into the Joyful and Triumphant Society of all their Pious Anceſtors, and have receiv'd again thoſe unblemiſh'd Souls, which they willingly ſacrificed in his Service, pure and immortal, at the Hands of that God, with whom they were ſo chearfully depoſited, and to whom be Glory for ever and ever. Amen.

The Author's Preface upon the Subject of Humane Frailty, and the Power and Providence of Almighty God.

HOW long are we to act like Boys at Fourſcore: our Heads covered with Grey-Hairs and not one Grain of ſenſe in them! This is the Condition of all Thoſe that ſet up their Reſt upon the Stability of Fortune, on the one hand, and at the ſame time abandon an Infallible Guide, in the Dictate of Reaſonable Nature, on the Other; Though nothing ſo Fickle under the Sun, as the Former, or ſo Steady, and Unchangeable as the Other. At This rate we Confound and Invert the Order and the Value of Things, as if there were no more in it than the Shuffling of Counters, while we take Certainties for Uncertainties, and Uncertainties for the Contrary. And what's the Reaſon of all This now, but that Weak and Short ſighted Men ſee beſt at hand; and give more Credit (Right or Wrong) to their Senſes, than to their Judgments: Whereas Fore-ſight, with a Reſpect to Things to Come, and Things Inviſible, muſt be the Work of Argument and Reaſoning: Not but that the Eye of the Soul is much Quicker and Sharper than That of the Body; ſaving only where the Point of it is taken off, either by Luxurious Exceſſes in Eating and Drinking, or by a Stupid unthinking Ignorance; the Greater Miſchief of the Two.

We ſhall never need to look further than into the Hiſtory of theſe Times, and the many wonderfull Things that have fallen out in This Juncture, for the Proof of an over-ruling Providence: A Providence, that takes Particular Care of all Virtuous Holy People, but more Eſpecially of Thoſe, that with Humility and Reverence give themſelves up as a Peculiar Heritage to the Worſhip and Service of the Almighty. Theſe are the People that the Chaldeans call Iſraelites, or [Seers of God:] which is a Bleſſing more valuable than the Treaſure of Ten Thouſand Worlds. Now if the Preſence of a Perſon Venerable for his Age; as a Governour, a Tutor, or a Father, ſhall have ſuch a Power over us as to keep us in Awe; and within the Compaſs of Modeſty and Reſpect, in our Lives and Manners: What Advantages may we propound to our ſelves then in the Elevation of our Thoughts beyond all Created Beings, and the enuring of our Souls to the Contemplation of an Uncreated Power! even God himſelf, who is Goodneſs, Beauty, and Bleſſedneſs in the Higheſt Degree: And all theſe Excellencies Infinitely ſhort yet of his Unſpeakable Perfections. For how is it Poſſible to Expreſs in Words, a Point utterly Inexplicable; or to Advance, by the Scale of his Attributes, to the underſtanding of an Incomprehenſible Myſtery! A Myſtery, ſo Inextricable, that if the whole Creation were but one Tongue, it would not ſerve to explain it: As his Omnipotency, in the making of the World; his Sovereignty, in the Monarchical Form of it, the Wiſdom of his Providential Conduct, in the Order and Government of it; and the Juſtice of his Proceeding toward both Good and Bad, in the Retribution of Rewards or Puniſhments. Nay, and the Vengeance it ſelf is to be reckon'd among the Things that we are the better for: not only for the Natural Equity ſake of dealing by all Men according to their Demerits; but as Chaſtiſement proves many times the Means of bringing People to a ſight and Senſe of their Crimes, or as it hinders them at leaſt from going on in their Wickedneſs: For the Puniſhing of One Man is Frequently the Saving of Another, for fear of the ſame Severity in Caſe of the ſame Offence.

CHAP. I.

The Bleſſed Condition of the Firſt Seven-Months-Reign of the Emperour Caius Caligula, after the Death of Tiberius.

THE Emperour Caius Caligula, that Succeeded Tiberius, may ſerve for a Lively Inſtance in Confirmation of what I have been ſaying: Never ſo Univerſal a Peace and Agreement thorough all the Provinces both by Sea and Land: Eaſt, Weſt, North, and South, all in a Profound Quiet; Greeks and Barbarians; Soldiers and Burghers living together like Brethren, and in the Mutual Exchange of all Neighbourly Offices of Friendſhip and Commerce. This was a Pitch of Felicity, to the Degree of almoſt Incredible, for a Young Prince to be welcomed to the Throne with an Affluence of all the Good Things that his very Heart could wiſh: a Prodigious Treaſure, both in Money and Plate; Wrought, and Unwrought, and as well for Ornament, as for Convenience: a Mighty Power both at Sea and Land, and the whole Habitable World contributing, as out of an Inexhauſtible Fountain, toward the Maintaining of his Armies. His Empire was Bounded with the Two Rivers, the Euphrates, and the Rhine, the Former Bordering upon Germany and other Barbarous Nations; the Other, upon the Parthians, the Sarmatians, and the Sythians, &c, a ſort of People not one jot better Civiliz'd than the other. So that from the Sun Riſing to the Sun Setting, as well upon the Continent, as in the Iſlands, there was nothing but Glee and good Humour: while Rome, Italy, and all the Provinces of Europe and Aſia kept Holy-Day, as we ſay, in a Perpetual Feſtival. Never were People in fine, by the Bleſſing of Providence, ſo Free and Eaſie under any other Prince: for every Private Man had ſo large a Share in the Common well-fare that his Good Fortune left him nothing more to ask: There was hardly any thing to be ſeen up and down the Towns, but Altars, Victims, Sacrifices, Candidates, Garlands, Chearful Looks, Feaſting, Merry Meetings, Muſical Conſorts, Racing, Treating, Dancing to the Flute and Harp, with all other Recreations imaginable: and the Poor all this while as well Satisfied as the Rich; Common People as Perſons of Quality; Servants as their Maſters; Debtors as their Creditors: Such, in ſhort, was the Felicity of Thoſe Times, for Plenty and Pleaſure and the Univerſal Satisfaction of Perſons and Families, that it look'd as if the Poets Phancy of Saturn's Golden Age were no longer a Fable. And This was the Bleſſed State of Things for the Firſt Seven Months of Caius's Reign.

CHAP. II.

The Emperour Caius fell deſperately Ill in the Eighth Month of his Reign; to the Great Affliction of the Provinces for his Diſtemper, and as great a Joy afterwards for his Recovery.

CAius, in the Month following, and in the very Glutt of his Good Fortunes, happen'd to fall extremely ill; for having quitted the Temperate, and conſequently the Healthful Courſe of Life he led under Tiberius, gave himſelf up to the Court-Liberties of Luxury, and Riot: as Eating and Drinking to Exceſs; the Unſeaſonable uſe of Baths. Nay and a Belly-full would not do his Buſineſs neither, without a Vomit after it to make way for more. He had plung'd himſelf likewiſe into all manner of Uncleanneſſes, with Both Sexes indifferently, from Common Appetites to the moſt unnatural of Luſts. He did all that was poſſible, in fine, by Senſuality, and Debauch, towards the Dividing of Soul and Body: For as Health and Strength are a Bleſſing that naturally attends Sobriety, and Good Order, ſo the Contrary Way of Government is as Certainly followed with Weakneſſes, Sickneſs, and Death.

It was now about the Beginning of Autumn, which is the Seaſon when the Return ſhips from all Quarters are upon their Laſt Voyage, Homeward-bound, back again: Thoſe I mean that would not Winter Abroad. By the Accident of this Opportunity, the Story of the Emperour's Sickneſs was immediately diſpers'd over the whole World, and by that Means the Univerſal Contentment and Satisfaction that the People enjoyed before the coming of That News, turned into as Univerſal a Mourning. Upon This Change, the Towns and the Houſes were all in Tears and Lamentations, in proportion to the Meaſure of the Comfortable Condition they were in before. The Provinces themſelves were all ſtruck in the very Perſon of the Emperour, rour, and in a more ſenſible Manners too; for Caius ſuffered only in his Body, but the People in their Minds: for fear of loſing, not only their Peace, but their Lives, Liberties and Eſtates alſo, for which they were Sollicitous, even to the Degree of Deſpair. Beſide that conſidering the fatal Conſequences that commonly attend the Death of Princes, whether by Famine, War, or otherwiſe, as Rapine, Depopulations, Baniſhments, Plunder, Impriſonments, Fears, Dangers, and Death it ſelf: All theſe Things conſidered, they could never think themſelves Safe, or Happy, but in the well-being of their Maſter.

The Emperour was by This Time upon the Mending-Hand, and the Bleſſed News of it diſpatched away in a Trice to the Furtheſt Quarters of the Earth. (For Fame flies like Lightning.) The People took This for an Earneſt of Better Tidings, and fell into a violent Impatience upon it to hear further, till at length their Longing was ſaved by ſeveral Expreſſes in Words at Length, that the Emperour was perfectly recovered: which was the ſame thing to the Provinces, as if They had been recovered Themſelves, and reſtored to their Former State and Humour of Jollity and Eaſe: Thoſe in the Iſles, as well as thoſe upon the Continent. Finally; there was never heard of in the Memory of Man, ſuch a Tranſport of Joy in any One People or Nation for the Preſervation of any Particular Prince, as was ſeen upon This Occaſion, quite thorough the Univerſe, for the Safety of Caius when he came to himſelf again. It look'd like a Tranſition (all in a Moment) from a Savage Life to a Sociable and Civil; from Deſerts to Political Communities, from Confuſion to Order, and all Theſe Advantages owing to the Government and Protection of a Generous and a Rightful Prince. But People were Glad of many things without ſeeing thorough them.

CHAP. III.

The Horrible Ingratitude, and Cruelty of the Emperour Caius, toward Young Tiberius.

IT was not long before Caius gave the World to underſtand, that their Judgments were Blinded; their Meaſures miſtaken; and that they Governed themſelves more by Gueſs than by Knowledge. For This Famous Prince, that was celebrated for the Profuſion of his Bounties and Favours all over Europe and Aſia, and for the moſt Illuſtrious Benefactor to all Glorious Purpoſes Publique and Private that ever was heard of: This Prince, I ſay, proved a Monſter; or rather he took off the Mask, and owned himſelf Bare-faced for what he was.

The Emperour Tiberius, had by his Son Druſus, young Tiberius, and by Germanicus Caius Caligula, whom he recommended in Preference to the Succeſſion; provided only, that he ſhould ſhew the Senſe he had of the Obligation, in his Reſpects to his Grand-Child. But This did not ſatisfie Caius; yet to hold That by Adoption, which the Other had a Right to by Birth: So that moſt Barbarouſly, and Ungratefully, he cauſed his Near Kinſman, the Co-heir of the Empire, and the next Succeſſor to Tiberius, to be put to Death; under a Pretext, that This Tiberius was in a Plot upon the Life of Caius: A very Unlikely Project for a Youth of his Tender Age to engage in. Beſide that it was generally thought that if the Young Man had but had ſome few years more upon his Back, the Emperour would have declared Tiberius his Succeſſor, for he was grown Jealous of Caius already, and upon taking him out of the way, the other would have had the Empire to Himſelf in Courſe. But Caius inſtead of ſharing the Sovereignty with his Kinſman, as in Juſtice he ſhould have done, entered into an Execrable Practice upon his Life too; and the way he took to Compaſs his End was This. He ſent for Tiberius in the Firſt place, and then calling a Council of his Friends about him, he made them a Diſcourſe much to This Effect.

" As to This Young Man, ſays he, (ſpeaking of Tiberius) I have not only the " Kindneſs of a Couſin-German for him, but the Love and Tenderneſs of a Brother: And " there is Nothing in This World my Heart is ſo much ſet upon, as to take him in " for a Partner in the Government, according to the Appointment of his Grand-Father, in his Laſt Will and Teſtament. But Youth alaſs, without Experience, ſtands in " more need of a Governour it ſelf, than of a Commiſſion to Govern Others. " If it were not for This Difficulty, how Glad and Ready ſhould I be to Eaſe my ſelf " of One Part of the Cares and Troubles of my Office, over ſo many Nations, by " Dividing the Burden, for fear of ſinking my ſelf under the Weight. But in the " mean while, let him depend upon me for Protection, and Advice; not only as a " Gover-

" Governour to his Pupil, but as a Father to a Son, which for the Future (and " pray take Notice of it) ſhall be the ſtyle betwixt us.

This Harangue wrought ſo effectually upon the Whole Council, and the Young Prince Himſelf too, that the very Ground-Work of the Plot was now as good as ſecured by it: for inſtead of Confirming the Adoption, and Poſſeſſing Tiberius of what he had a Title to, it made Void the Grant of what was given him already. So that Caius was now left at Liberty to treat his Colleague and Co-Partner in the Empire, at what Treacherous rate he pleaſed. For the Roman Law gives Parents an Abſolute Authority over their Children, and it gives the Supreme Magiſtrate alſo as unaccountable a Power over the People; acting all Things at Will and Pleaſure ſo that Caius had no more to do toward the Gaining of his Point, than firſt to declare Tiberius an Enemy, and then to treat him like one, whether he were one or no. And This he did, without any Regard, either to his Years or to an Old Acquaintance; or finally, to his Quality; as a Perſon that had been trained up by the Emperour in a Proſpect of the Succeſſion: For after the Death of Druſus, Tiberius was to be reputed a Son rather than a Grand-Child.

There goes a Report, that Caius commanded Tiberius to do Execution upon himſelf, and at the ſame time ſtrictly prohibited ſeveral Tribunes and Centurions who were then preſent, to aſſiſt him in the Action, upon a Point of Honour forſooth, that it was not for the Dignity of the Bloud-Royal to be Spilt by a Common Hand. So Careful he was of doing Things in Form, that he made a Scruple of the very Murder it ſelf that was not committed according to Law, and covered his Hypocriſie with a Maſque of Holineſs.

This Innocent Prince that had never ſeen Bloud drawn either in Jeſt or in Earneſt: no not ſo much as in a Mock-Combat, or the Repreſentation of a Battle in a Time of Peace; an Exerciſe well known among Princes and Men at Arms: This Prince, I ſay; what did he do, but firſt offer his Throat to every Man he met, and then when he ſaw no Body would do him the good Office, he took a Ponyard himſelf, and asked the People where he ſhould ſtrike, to make the ſureſt Diſpatch of a Miſerable Life. They told Him, How, and where, and He followed their Direction over and over. After This Manner was Tiberius taught in His Extremity, how to Murder Himſelf.

CHAP. IV.

Caius puts Macro to Death; to whom he ſtood indebted for his Life and Fortune.

THis was Caius's Maſter-piece, and the Great Difficulty of his Life and Reign was now over: for he had no Competitor to fear, nor any man of Credit that was able to make a Party againſt him. The Next Blow was at Macro; wherein he ſhewed himſelf Cruel and Ungrateful to the higheſt Degree.

This Macro had done him many Signal and Faithful Services, not only after his coming to the Crown, when a Paraſite or a Court-flatterer would have done the ſame Thing, but even before his Advancement alſo, or I might have ſaid in order to it: For he was look'd upon as the Chief Inſtrument that prevailed upon Tiberius to make Choice of him for his Succeſſor, Tiberius was now in years; and ever Crafty; both upon the Account of a Natural Sagacity, and a long Experience, and one that underſtand Men, no Creature better. He took up a Great many Jealouſies concerning Caius, as a Mortal Enemy to the whole Claudian Family, or if he had any Tenderneſs for his Relations, it was for Thoſe he thought by the Mother-ſide. This put a great many Troubleſome Scruples in his Head, what would become of the Poor Child if he Himſelf ſhould Die before him. Neither did he look upon Caius as a Perſon Competent for the weight of the Commiſſion he pretended to, but as a Man that had neither Brains nor Civility; and one that by the Levity and Inconſiſtence of his Words and Actions, a Body would have judged ſcarce well in his Wits. Macro did all however that was poſſible to be done, for the laying of Theſe Jealouſies, and the keeping of Tiberius Quiet and Eaſie. He would be often telling him how great a Deference and Veneration Caius had for his Perſon, and Dignity; and in particular, ſo Generous a Friendſhip and Reſpect for his Kinſman, that he would be glad with all his Heart to ſee him the ſingle Lord of the whole Empire, if it might ſtand with the Publique Good. And that This Modeſty and Reſerve had the ill Fortune to be Miſtaken for want of Senſe and Reſolution. But This would not do, and when Macro perceived it, he offered to become Bound Body for Body that it ſhould ſhould be all made good upon the Firſt Occaſion. Now Macro being a Man of a Tried Fidelity to the Cæſars, and more Expreſly yet to Tiberius Himſelf, in the Conſpiracy of Sejanus, (which Macro both Detected and Cruſhed) there was no Room left for a Doubt upon the Faith and Credit of the Mediator. But to ſhorten the ſtory, Macro was never well but when he was doing Caius ſome Good Office or other, and commending him to Tiberius; at leaſt if it could be called a Commendation to Defend a Man againſt Dark Surmiſes and Reports, and uncertain Accuſations. But in one Word, he could not have done more for the Neareſt Relation he had in the World than he did for Caius. Some would have it that This was done in Conſideration of the Good Underſtanding that had always been betwixt Caius and Macro; who was at that Time highly in Credit with the Emperour. Others aſcribed it to an Intrigue with Macro's Wife, that for ſome Private Reaſons, beſt known to her ſelf, lay perpetually at her Husband on the Behalf of the Young Man, to do him upon all Occaſions the Beſt Offices he could; and there's no reſiſting the Charms of a Wanton Woman that menages with Art and Addreſs.

Now Macro, that knew nothing as yet of his Wives being Falſe, attributed all her Fondneſſes and Careſſes to the Force of a Conjugal Affection, and was thereby ſo far impoſed upon that he took the moſt Deadly Enemies he had in the World for his Trueſt Friends. He was Conſcious to Himſelf how Faithfully he had ſerved Caius in ſeveral Extremities, where his Life was at Stake; and in the Confidence of That Merit, he had ſome ſort of Right, he thought, to be Plainer with him than Another Man: For his Buſineſs was, like a Great Maſter, to make his Work Perfect, and Laſting by preſerving him, both from Himſelf, and Others. As for Example; When he ſaw him ſometimes aſleep at the Table, he would take the Freedom now and then to Wake him, with a Private Hint, that it was neither Decent, nor Safe: for it laid him open to any Man that had a Deſign upon his Life. And ſo at any time when Caius was playing the Jack-pudding with Buffoons and Tumblers; or laughing out-right at the Scurrilous Conceits of a Merry-Andrew, like an Ill-bred Boy; or perhaps playing a Part Himſelf, in a Band of Common Fidlers, if it was Macro's Hap to be within Reach of him, it was his way to give him a Private Touch with his Elbow; a Diſcouraging Wink, or ſome Secret Whiſper, and at the End of all, This Following Admonition.

" It is not for you, Sir, to See, Hear, and Gratifie your ſenſes, like Other Men, " but you are to Advance your ſelf as ſuch above the reſt of the World in the Dig- " nity of your Mind, as you are in the Elevation of your Perſon. For what could " be more Incongruous, than for the Maſter of the World to entertain himſelf " with the Amuſements of Singing, Dancing, Inſipid Jeſting, and other Fopperies " of That Kind! Whereas it is His Part, in all Caſes, Times, and Places to uphold " the Majeſty of an Imperial Prince, as a ſhepherd ſet over the whole Flock, and " Improving his Character dayly. But Macro went further yet.

" When it ſhall be your Hap, ſays he, to be at the Circus, the Theatre, or any o- " ther Publique Spectacle or Exerciſe, you are not ſo much to attend the thing in " it ſelf, as the Induſtry in the Compoſure, and to Reaſon the Matter Thus; If " People take ſuch Care and Pains to pleaſe the Spectators, without any Benefit to " Mankind, purely for Popular Applauſe; and at Laſt Reckon it as an Ample Re- " ward, to carry the Cauſe with Credit. What ſhall we expect from the Profeſſion " of a much more Excellent Art? That is to ſay, the Art of Government, which " Provides for Tillage, Planting, Navigation, and the Security of Commerce in " the Eſtabliſhment of a Reciprocal Exchange of Commodities all over the Provin- " ces for the Supply one of another. Not but that ſome Perſons and Places have been " Teinted with a Venomous Envy for This Bleſſed Proviſion and Agreement; but " the Malignity never went ſo far however, as to Poiſon the Whole World; no, " nor the Greater Part of it: Here and there a Man, or a Family, or perhaps a " City or Two might be concerned, but for Whole Countries, or Nations, there " has been nothing of it: Eſpecially ſince your Illuſtrious Family has had the Ad- " miniſtration of the Government. But the Monſters that formerly had the Confi- " dence to domineer in the very Hearts of the Towns, are now glad to ſhift for " themſelves, like Wild Beaſts, into Caves, and Hiding Holes; and have left us " in Exchange a Beneficial Entercourſe of Correſpondence with all Quarters of the " Earth; which is all ſubjected entirely to your Good Pleaſure and Conduct. This " Empire, in fine looks like a mighty Ship, and your ſelf by Providence ſet at the " Helm where you are left anſwerable for the ſafety of the Veſſel, as you tender the " Good of Mankind. Wherefore pray be ſure to have a Care of it, and make " it the Buſineſs and Comfort of your Life to promote the Happineſs of your Peo- " ple. Private Perſons may do many Good Offices among themſelves; ſome, one " way, and ſome, another, both Publique and Private; but it is from the Bounty " and Wiſdom of the Prince alone, that the People can ever pretend to be Free, " and Eaſie. He muſt have an Open Hand, and a Large Soul, and no Barr to his " Liberality, but what ſhall be found Neceſſary for a Reſerve, to anſwer all the " Ends, the needs, and the Chances, of Government.

Here was a Great deal of Good will and Friendly Advice caſt away, to very little purpoſe: For Caius inſtead of being the Better for't, was the Worſe; and Macro utterly Ruined, over and above, for the Good Office: His Counſel rejected, and his Perſon treated with Contempt. For Caius had taken ſuch an Averſion to him, that when he ſaw him at any time coming towards him, at a Diſtance, he would be ſaying to Thoſe about him,

Look you, Good People, here comes my Governour; but I thank my Starsfor't, I am out of my Wardſhip; he ſets up for my Maſter too, but I am paſt a Boy; and ſo likewiſe for a Monitor to one that underſtands the World better than Himſelf. The Pedant takes upon him to Inſtruct an Emperour how to Behave himſelf toward his Subjects; and an Emperour that underſtands all the Arts of Court-Politicks at Another rate than he can pretend to. This Man now has the Vanity to act the Part of my Maſter, but I would fain know where he learnt that skill Himſelf that I want. Alas! I have been Trained up from my Cradle, to the Myſteries of ſtate, under Variety of Tutors; as Father, Brothers, Uncles, Couſins, Grand-Fathers, Great-Grand-Fathers; beſide a Continued Succeſſion of ſo many Great Princes in a Right Line, both by Father and Mother, to ſay nothing of the ſeeds of Royal Virtues that ſhew themſelves commonly in the Forming of a Governour. For as Children, many times reſemble their Parents, not in Face, and Manners only, but in their very Motions, Humours, Habits, Geſtures, &c. So does Nature Infuſe Royal Abilities into the very Veins of a Governour. And ſhall a ſot take upon him now to Inſtruct Me in the Myſteries of an Art that I brought into the World with Me? And yet here's an obſcure, Mean wretch, that has the Face to lie Tutoring me upon a Subject he knows nothing at all of himſelf.

Caius was by This Time ſo Embittered againſt Macro, that nothing leſs than his Life would ſerve his Turn; and whether the Charge were True or Falſe, it mattered not, provided only that it would bear a Colour to make it Plauſible. When his Head was working upon This Thought, he pitched upon a certain Expreſſion of Macro's for the Ground of an Accuſation.

" Caius, ſays he, is a Man of my Making, and more obliged to Me for what he " Is, than to Him that begot him. It was my Intereſt, that not only Once but " Thrice reſcued him from the Rage of Tiberius, when he would have put him to " Death. And then after the Death of Tiberius, when the Pretorian Bands were " under my Command, I gave up my Guards into his Hands, with This Monitory " Precaution, that the Empire could never be ſafe and Entire, but in the Hands " of a Single Perſon. This was all True beyond Contradiction, and not without the Approbation of ſeveral that heard it; who were not as yet acquainted with the Dark and Slippery Ways of Caius; and that Diſſembling and Hypocriſie were his Maſter Piece. Briefly, it was not many Days before the Unfortunate Macro, and his Wife, were both taken out of the way, by a Barbarity, anſwerable, in the other Extreme, to the Degree of ſo many Generous Services. But This is the Ungrateful Man's way of Reckoning with his Benefactors, and it was an Honeſt Man's Reward too, for ſaving the Life of a Brute, and Setting a Monſter upon the Throne. There goes a Report that the Man and the Woman were Both forced to lay Violent Hands upon Themſelves, notwithſtanding the Tenderneſs of Cæſar for his Miſtreſs. But the Gluts, and the Loathings of an Irregular Love, are Unaccountable.

CHAP. V.

Caius puts his Father-in-Law M. Sylanus to Death, and ſeveral others.

WHen This Treacherous Prince had rid himſelf of the Danger of a Competitor, and cut off Macro, with his whole Family to a ſingle Man, in Requital for the ſaving of his Life and Empire, his Third Exploit was to be upon his Father-in-Law, M. Silanus, whichhe looked upon as his Maſter-piece.

This Marcus Silanus was a Man Brave, and Nobly Born: and His Daughter dying young, the Father paid Caius the ſame Reſpects ſtill, if not Greater, afterwards than he had done before: Not doubting of a Reciprocal Return; and not Imagining, what a Weather-Cock he had to do withal. Silanus, being a Frank, Plain-Dealing Man, was much upon the Topique of Morals, and Politicks; as the Offices, and Functions, of a Prince, and the Meaſures of Good Manners, and Government. Now This was a Freedom that he had ſome ſort of Title to, by his Quality and Station: beſide that the Wound of his Daughters Death, being yet Freſh and Bleeding upon him, the ſenſe of the Affinity he thought could not be ſo ſoon forgotten. But Caius took all manner of Good Counſel for Reproach, and Conſequently his Beſt Friends for his Mortal Enemies: Himſelf being ſo Wiſe, ſo Valiant ſo Temperate, ſo Juſt, and in fine every way ſo Perfect, in his own Conceit, that he reckoned it as a Scandal to be Charged with the very Poſſibility of being Better: So that whoever pretended to Adviſe him, did it at his own Peril. He had a Quarel alſo to Silanus as a kind of Check upon him, in the Courſe of his Extravagant Luſts; and in That Fit of Cutrage he bad a final Adieu to the Memory of his Dead Wife, and followed the Barbarity with a Treacherous Practice upon the Life of her Own Father, and, at the ſame time, to the moſt Indulgent Father-in-Law under the Sun, in the ſame Perſon. The Fame of This Murder, and Others little leſs Conſiderable, that followed upon it, ſtruck the whole World with Horrour, and Indignation, but they kept their Thoughts to Themſelves, for fear of the Worſt. But for the People now, that are eaſily impoſed upon, and Firm to Nothing; the People, I ſay, were ſo far from believing it Poſſible for a Prince to be ſo Humane, Candid, and Generous one Day, and ſo Mercileſs, Falſe, and Bloudy the Next, that they took upon them the Juſtification of what he had done, and to plead the Equity of the Cauſe in his Defence.

" As to what concerns the Death of Young Tiberius; 'Tis againſt Nature, they ſaid, " to admit a Partner in Sovereignty, and it was only an Act of Prevention, to take " away the Life of a Man that would otherwiſe have taken away His Life, if he had " got him in his Power. Now Caius, in This Action, was not ſo properly to be cal- " led a Murderer, as an Inſtrument of Divine Providence, in Removing Tiberius out " of the Way, for the Common Good of Mankind: for fear of Factions, and Par- " ties; ſome drawing one way and ſome another, ſo as to Embroil the Empire in " the Miſeries, both of a Foreign, and of an Inteſtine, War. Now Peace is un- " doubtedly the Greateſt of Bleſſings, and what is it but an orderly Government " that keeps People Quiet? that is to ſay, a Government where no Competitions " are encouraged by any Diviſion of the Princes.

They had their Reaſonings likewiſe upon the Caſe of Macro. " Macro they cried was " a Proud Haughty Man; and had forgot the Delphick Oracle, that bids Every Man " [know Himſelf] giving to underſtand, that whoever Cons that Leſſon well, can " never be Miſerable, nor any Man Happy without it. What has a Subject to do " in the Province of a Prince, or to take upon him to teach his Maſter his Duty? " 'Tis the Sovereign's Province to Command, and the Subjects to Obey. At This rate " it is that the ſilly People deſcant upon Wholſome Counſels, and Admonitions; Part- " ly for want of ſenſe to diſtinguiſh one Thing from another; and partly for want " of Honeſty and Plain-dealing, in the Confounding both of Names and Things.

" They had their Flurts at Silanus too: How Ridiculous he made himſelf in claim- " ing the ſame Authority over a Son-in-Law that a Father hath over his own Son: " whereas Private Citizens make no Difficulty of giving way to their own Children, in " caſe of any Honourable Charge or Preferment, but This Man had the Confidence, " without the very Pretence of being ſo much as a Father-in-Law, to intermeddle in " Matters he had nothing to do withall, for the Affinity died with the Daughter. " Marriage 'tis true, ties Families together for the Preſent, but the Death of either " Party diſſolves the Relation.

This was the Talk every where to ſave the Emperour's Credit as far as poſſible: For the High Opinion they had of this Prince's Character above all others, for Bounty, and Good Nature had ſo far prepoſſeſſed them in his Favour, that they could not thing any thing amiſs of him, eſpecially upon ſo ſudden a Change, from One Extreme to Another.

CHAP. VI.

Caius ſets up for a Demi-God.

THeſe Three Horrid Outrages, were as Good to Caius as ſo many Triumphs over the Empire, in the Perſons of Tiberius, Macro, and Silanus; for now theſe Three were gone, he had nothing more to fear, either from the Imperial Family, the Soldiery, or the Senate, Silanus being the Glory of That Illuſtrious Body. But now he had gotten the World at his Feet, an Arrogant Freak of Vanity carried him further yet, and nothing would ſerve him but Divine Honours, and, tranſlating of the Emperour into a Demi-God. Now the Ground of the Whimſy was This.

He phancy'd to himſelf, That as the Maſter and Leader of Troops and Flocks of Beaſts, as Shepherds, Goat-herds, Herdſmen, and the like, are not Sheep, Goats, nor Oxen, Themſelves, but Reaſonable Creatures, and infinitely above them; ſo ſhould the Supreme Governour of Men in Society, be allow'd to have ſomewhat in him above the Scale of Humane Nature, that may deſerve a Place among the Gods.

This Phantaſtical Imagination was no ſooner in his Head, but the Foolery went down with him for a Truth; and ſhew'd it ſelf ſoon after, in the Effects of his Blaſphemous Phrenſie; as he went on further and further ſtill by degrees. The Firſt Step of his Ambition was to be a Demi-God; ſuch an one as Bacchus, Hercules, Caſtor, Trophonius, Amphiaraus, Amphilocus, and the like. He made himſelf Sport all this while, with their Oracles and Ceremonies, but ſtill aſſuming to Himſelf what he took away from Others.

And then he would be changing Habits and Perſons, like a Comedian upon the Stage. One while he would act Hercules, with his Lion's Skin and his Club; Another while he would dreſs himſelf with a Cap upon his Head, and Perſonate Caſtor. Sometime again, he would appear in a Faun's Skin, and his Thyrſus wrap'd up in Ivy, in Imitation of Bacchus. But he had this, Peculiar to himſelf, that whereas his Fellow-Demi-Gods were well enough content with their ſeveral Enſigns, and Privileges apart, Caius engroſs'd them All to Himſelf, for his own greater Honour, in the outdoing even of Thoſe that he envy'd.

But That which drew the greateſt Train of Followers after him, was not that he had Three Bodies like Geryon; but what was more wonderful, the turning of One Body into ſo many Shapes, like Proteus in Homer, that Transforms himſelf into Elements, Animals, Rivers, and what not?

But what are you the better, Caius, for this way of Reſembling the Figures of the Demi-Gods, without imitating their Virtues? The Labours, and the Hazzards of Hercules, were all employ'd for the Good of Mankind, in delivering the World, both at Sea and Land, from the Monſters that infeſted it. Bacchus Planted and Cultivated the Vines, and drew a Cordial Drink from them in the Juice of the Grape, that Cheers both Body and Mind. It lays our Cares aſleep, and at the ſame time, makes us forget our Misfortunes, and hope for better. Wine, in ſhort, makes us Strong, Active, and Healthful: Private Perſons, Cities and Families, are all the better for it; and a Cheerful Cup is but a Tranſition from Labour to Reſt. And when all is done, 'tis a Comfort and a Relief, both to Greeks and Barbarians, and their Feaſts, Merry-Meetings, Muſick, and Dancings, are nothing without it. Let this ſuffice now to the Honour of Wine.

Now as to Jupiter's Two Twins, Caſtor and Pollux, the One of them was Immortal, they ſay, and the Other Mortal; and the Immortal Brother had ſo Paſſionate a Tenderneſs for the Other, that he choſe rather to devolve part of his own Privilege upon his Brother, and to ſubject himſelf to the Fate of other Mortals, than to outlive ſo dear a Friend; For, ſays he, what will my Immortality ſignifie to me, after my Brother's Death, but an Everlaſting Mourning for ſo Irreparable a Loſs. Upon this Pinch, he bethought himſelf of an Expedient, to compound the Difficulty, by dividing the Mortality and Immortality of the Two Brothers equally betwixt them; and fixing Two Differing Natures upon the ſame Bottom of Equity and Reaſon.

Now Theſe Worthies were Famous Men in their Generations, and ſo they continue to this Day, both for their Perſonal Piety, and the Good Offices they have render'd to the Publick; upon which Account they have made themſelves Venerable for their Virtue. But now, Caius, what Great, or Good Thing did you ever do, to entitle your ſelf to the Honour of a Demi-God? To begin with Caſtor: Inſtead of Emulating the Heroical Bravery of ſo Generous a Friend and Brother; your Merit lies in the Mercileſs and Inhumane Murder of an Innocent Prince, your own Fleſh and Blood, and Rightful Co-partner in the Empire; and that Murder follow'd with the Baniſhment of his Siſters, to ſecure your Uſurpation. Or what have you done after the Precedent of Bacchus? What new Invention that the World was ever the better for? Is Mankind ever the Eaſier, or the Happier, for you? But, to your Praiſe be it ſpoken, you have found out Inventions indeed. Inventions, that like an Epidemical Peſtilence turn Joy into Heavineſs and Mourning, and make all People weary of their Lives. And pray what's the Return you make for the Vaſt Treaſures that come flowing daily into your Coffers, from the Four Quarters of the Earth, to gratify an Inſatiable Avarice, but Inſupportable Impoſitions, by unheard of Taxes and Tributes, to make the Burden of the Oppreſſion Odious and Intolerable. Is This a Way of Proceeding now, after the Example of Bacchus?

Or

Or what ſhall we ſay in the next place, to the Indefatigable Hercules? His Publick-ſpirited Labours, and Bold Adventures: Wholſome Laws, Righteous Judgments; Plenty, both at Sea and Land; and all to eſtabliſh Peace and Commerce over the Face of the Univerſe. Here's a ſhort Character of Hercules; and let us now compare the Copy with the Original, and ſee what a Picture we have gotten of that Hero, in Caius. A Dull Slothful Wretch, and ſo far from Brave, that he's as Timorous as a Hare: nothing of Order, Quiet, or Comfort, but on the contrary, Sedition, Miſery, and Tumult, where-ever he comes. And this Caius ſetting up at laſt for a Demi-God in Imitation of Hercules.

Now ſpeak, Caius, is it for thy Butchery and Tyranny, that thou hopeſt to be made a God? Or is it thy Spite to Mankind, to conſider, that being Immortal thy ſelf, all the Plagues thou haſt brought upon the World muſt be likewiſe Everlaſting: Now I am of Another Opinion, and that if thou wert already upon the very Liſt for a God, the Lewdneſs of thy Life would bring thee down again, into a State of Mortality; for if Virtue can make a God, Wickedneſs conſequently will Degrade him. It is not for the Murderer of his Brother to take Sanctuary under the Protection of the Moſt Illuſtrious Friendſhip betwixt Two Brothers that ever was heard of; neither is it for any Man to entitle himſelf to the Merits of Hercules and Bacchus, that lives in a Contradiction to their Principles of Honour and Virtue.

CHAP. VII.

Caius grows Worſe and Worſe; and ſets up for a God of a Superiour Order.

THE Madneſs of Caius was by this time advanced to ſo Extravagant a Pitch, that a Demi-God's Place would not now content him, without entring into a Competition with the Gods of the Firſt Rate; as Apollo, Mars, and Mercury. He began with Mercury, and ſo dreſs'd himſelf up in all the Ornaments and Enſigns of his Dignity, as the Mantle, the White Rod, the Wings and Buskins; valuing himſelf all this while, upon Order, in Confuſion it ſelf, and Reaſon, in the Head of a Man that's Brain-ſick. When he had done with Mercury, he ſtript himſelf of that Maſquerade, and perſonated Apollo, with a Radiant Crown upon his Head, a Bow and Arrows in his Left Hand, and the Graces in his Right: Intimating, That we ſhould be forward and ready to do Good Offices, and ſlow to Puniſh.

After this, there were Holy Songs and Dances exhibited to this New God; though well enough ſatisfied but a little before, in the Perſon of Bacchus, with the Appellations of Liber, Evius, and Lycæus. He would then again, by Fits, be taking upon himſelf the Perſon of Mars, accouter'd with a coſtly Head-piece, Sword, and Buckler; taking his March, with his Prieſts and Bravoes on each Hand of him, and ſo act Mars himſelf to the Life, in the Execution of his Blood-thirſty Cruelties. This Horrid Spectacle ſtruck an Aſtoniſhing Terrour into all that beheld it; to ſee a Counterfeit Uſurp upon the Honours of theſe Heroes, though a perfect Enemy to their Virtue, and Reſembling them in nothing but their Habits; which have no further Meaning than as Intimations of the Bounty and Goodneſs of the Gods to thoſe that truly Love and Fear them. And what's the Moral now of Mercury's Winged Buskins? But that being the Meſſenger or the Embaſſadour of the Gods, as the Greek Word imports, and the Bearer of Good Tidings, (as neither God nor Man would be the Author of Ill News) 'tis fit he ſhould be Quick in his Diſpatches where Haſt is ſo Requiſite. And what again does his Wand or White Rod ſignify? But the Enſign of a League or a Peace-maker: for 'tis the Herald that puts an End to the Warr either by Agreement or Truce; and without the Mediation of this Good Office we ſhould lie tearing one another to Pieces without either End or Meaſure. But what did Caius's Wings ſerve him for ſaving only to Publiſh the Execrable Lewdneſs of his Life and Manners over the Face of the whole Earth, a Scandal that on the contrary ſhould rather have been bury'd in Silence. Neither was there any Occaſion for the Figure of a Speedy Paſſage to a Wretch that might have ſtood ſtill in the ſame Place, and like an Unexhauſtible Fountain have laid the World under Water. And what Uſe had he again for the Figure of a Wand or a Peace-maker that was never the Author of one Temperate Word or Action? For there was nothing where he had to do, whether among Greeks or Barbarians, in Private Houſes or in Cities, but Civil Wars, Heart-burnings and Sedition: wherefore our Imaginary Mercury ſhould do well to quit a Name and a Pretence he has ſo little Colour of a Title to.

Neither is he one jot liker Apollo than he was to Mercury. He wears a Sparkling Crown, 'tis true, and the Beams of the Sun Artificially wrought upon it, but what's the Sun to Deeds that would not bear the Light? An Honeſt and a Virtuous Action cannot have too many Eyes to look upon it, no not the Sun it ſelf in his Meridian Glory; and the Brighter the Better. But for Foul, Impious, and Diſhonourable Practices that will not ſtand the Teſt, as they were Works of Darkneſs in the very Conſcience of them, ſo let them remain condemn'd to the Regions of Darkneſs, and never ſee the Light. But let him change Hands now, and take the Bow and the Arrows in his Right Hand, and deſtroy Men, Women, and Children, Cities and Families, according to his Cuſtom, and then let him cover the Graces in his Left Hand, unleſs he had rather throw them away: For he is evidently guilty of Horrible Oppreſſions, out of an Immoderate Love of Money: and then follows his Rapines, with the Murder of the Proprietors; by which means he turns the very Bounties of Providence into a Snare, by making it a Crime to be Wealthy. And it is much the ſame Caſe with our Mock-Apollo in the Matter of Phyſick; who inſtead of being the Inventor of Salutary Remedies, and of a Good-natur'd Readineſs to aſſiſt People, either in the Preventing or in the Curing of Diſeaſes, infects the Sound, makes Cripples of Men in perfect Health, diſpatches Men before their Time, and enter'd ſo far into the Art of Poiſoning, that if Divine Juſtice had not given him a Check in the Courſe of his Wickedneſs, there would hardly have been one Honeſt or Subſtantial Man left, eſpecially in Italy, and other Populous Places; for there was more Gold and Silver hoarded up within that Compaſs of Ground than in the whole World beſide. But he began at Home, and ſhew'd himſelf the Scourge, the Plague, and the Ruine of the People. Apollo was as famous alſo for his Predictions, as for his Phyſick; but all ſtill for the Good of Mankind. For when People were in the Dark, and Doubtful, and in Danger of taking Good for Evil; he never fail'd with his Oracles to ſet them Right, and to keep them from Wavering. Nay, his Fore-knowledge of the Future was ſo certain, that Men believ'd it as if they had ſeen it with their Eyes. But what if we ſhould compare the Doughty Oracles of Caius now with Thoſe of Apollo? His Prognoſticks of Infamy, Confiſcations, Exiles and Executions to all Men of Quality and Merit? Where's the Affinity betwixt our New Apollo, and the Other, that never did the like? Wherefore let us have no more Mock-Songs of Joy and Triumph, to the Tune of True Ones; for if the Counterfeiting of a Princes Image upon his Coin, be reckon'd a Crime, a Falſe Worſhip is worſe certainly than Falſe Money.

But the greateſt Surprize of all the reſt, is the taking upon him to perſonate the Strength and Bravery of Mars, with a broken Carcaſs that has not the Soul in it of a Woman, and then making no more Difficulty of putting the Cheat upon the Spectators, than as if it were but a Scene of a Play upon a Stage. But without any more adoe, take them Body and Mind, and no Two Things can be more unlike. I do not ſpeak of the Fabulous, or the Phantome Mars; but of the Other; by which we underſtand the Force of a Natural Courage in the Protection of the Innocent, and for the Relief of the Oppreſſed, according to the Etymon of the Greek Word, Ἄρης from ἀρήγειν, to help. Mars, in fine, has Two Names; One of them a Lover of Peace, ſo far as it conduces to the Good of the Publick; and the Other, as much a Friend to War, that is ſure to be attended with Blood and Confuſion.

CHAP. VIII.

Caius's Rage againſt the Jews, for refuſing to pay him Divine Honour.

HERE's enough ſaid to ſhew, That Caius had no Pretence to liſt himſelf upon the Roll of the Gods; no, not ſo much as upon That of the Demi-Gods: for there was no ſort of Agreement betwixt them, either in their Nature, or in their Eſſence; or more particularly, in their Inclinations and Manners. Men are blinded with their Luſts, eſpecially when they are ſeconded by Ambition, Obſtinacy, the love of Contention, and the Licentious Impotency of Unbridl'd Appetites. But Men do not know when they are Well, and This was our Ruine. Now Caius had nothing under the Cope of Heaven to fear, but the Jews, to Croſs him in his Deſign; being a People train'd up from their Cradle under the Care of Parents, Tutors, and Maſters, the Doctrine of Holy Writ, and the Law of Nature, to the Belief only of One God, the Father and Creator of the World. I ſpeak this of the Jews, for as to the Reſt; Men and Women, Cities, Nations, Countries, Provinces; or I might have ſaid, well-nigh the whole Univerſe, how much ſoever againſt the Grain, they join'd nevertheleſs with the Faction; cry'd up Caius to the Skies, and conſequently gave his Pride and Vanity ſome ſort of Reputation.

Nay, there were certain Romans, that deſcended ſo low, as to introduce the Barbarous way of Worſhip into Italy it ſelf, to the Scandal of their Liberties. But the

Jews,

Jews, I ſay, were the only Nation from whom they apprehended any Oppoſition; a People, that rather than part with the leaſt Scruple of their Country's Rites, would embrace Death as cheerfully, as if it were but entring into a State of Immortality: For 'tis in this Caſe as it is in Buildings, take out one Stone, and though the reſt may ſeem to ſtand firm at preſent, Time will moulder it by Degrees, till it falls all to pieces. And the Point in Queſtion was no Trifle neither, but a Matter, on the contrary, of the Higheſt Importance imaginable; and no leſs than the transforming of Fleſh and Blood into a Deity; and turning a Mortal Man into an Immortal God. A moſt Execrable Blaſphemy; and the Phancy would have been more Tolerable, if it had been the turning of a God into a Man, inſtead of a Man into a God. Beſide the Gap that it would open into all manner of Wickedneſs, as Infidelity and Ingratitude to the Author of all Mercies and Bounties, in the Diſtribution of his Bleſſings and Graces to the Common Good and Comfort of Mankind.

This was it that involv'd our Nation in ſo Deſtructive and Mercileſs a War. For what greater Miſery can befall a Servant, than to lie under the Mortal Hatred of his Maſter? Now the Subjects of Emperours are Servants, but how eaſily ſoever they liv'd under Former Emperours, the Government of Caius made their Condition Inſupportable: a Prince without any Bowels of Humanity, or Compaſſion: One that knew no other Law but his Own Will, and abrogated all other Proviſions, as Superfluous. But ſtill of all People under the Sun, Ours were certainly the moſt Deſpicable, of Slaves, and Drudges, under the Arbitrary Rigour of a Tyrannical Monſter, inſtead of a Father of his People.

CHAP. IX.

The Horrid Outrages of the Alexandrians againſt the Jews, upon This Occaſion of Caius's Perſecution.

THE Alexandrians had no ſooner got Notice of the Spiteful Practices of Caius againſt the Jews, but the Rabble immediately laid hold of the Occaſion to revenge themſelves upon them, for an Old Grudge; and ſo enter'd into a Conſpiracy to put all in a Tumult. The Work went on ſo unanimouſly, that it look'd as if the Emperour himſelf had been a Party to the Uproar, or that we had been all Priſoners at Mercy: So Brutal and Bloody was the Execution they did upon us; breaking up of Houſes, turning Man, Woman, and Child out of Doors, and then rifling and carrying away all they could lay their Hands on that was Precious. And this not done under any Awe neither, or in the Dark; like common Night-Thieves, that are afraid of being taken up and brought to Juſtice; but They committed theſe Robberies in the very Face of the Sun: ſhewing what they had gotten to every body they met, with as much Confidence as if it had been an Inheritance or a Purchace Nay, they had Companies and Societies among themſelves, that went Sharers in the Booty, dividing the Spoil, even in the Market-place, and the Proprietors Themſelves, as it fell out ſometimes, looking on; and not without Scomms and Virulent Railings over and above.

This was a Hard Caſe, at leaſt, if it may paſs for one, to have Men of Quality and Eſtates turn'd out of all in a Moment, and made Scoundrels and Beggars without ſo much as knowing their Fault. But ſo it is, that they were fore'd from their Habitations, and expos'd like Vagabonds to the Wide World, and no Proviſions along with them to keep Life and Soul together. And this was all nothing yet, to that which follow'd. For after the Cooping up of ſo many Thouſands of Men, Women, and Children in a Narrow Place, like Beaſts in a Pound; and nothing along with them to keep them from Starving, they made no doubt of finding them in a few Days a Pile of Carcaſſes; for want either of Food or of Breath, the Place being Cloſe and Smothering, and the Air corrupted with Malignant Vapours from the Vitiated Lungs of a Confus'd Crowd of People: which in this Caſe is but adding Fire to Fire. Now the Body is Hot in it ſelf, and that Heat requires a Refreſhing Air from Without to aſſiſt Reſpiration; but Hot upon Hot puts all out of order.

Such, in fine, were the Difficulties of This Place, that there was no longer any living in it for want of Air, ſo that the Poor People were forc'd abroad in This Extremity; Some withdrew toward the Sea-ſide, Others betook themſelves to ſome Remote Burying-places; ſome one way, ſome another, and all Gaſping for Breath. As for thoſe that ſtay'd behind, in any other part of the City, or came into't afterward while this Outrage was a-foot, without knowing any thing of the Matter, theſe miſerable Wretches were batter'd with Tiles and Brick-batts, their Limbs broken, and their Brains beaten out with Cudgels, and thoſe Parts of the Body principally aim'd at, at, where the Wound or the Bruiſe was moſt likely to be Mortal. And it far'd not much better with Thoſe neither, who were Coop'd up, as I ſaid, into That Narrow Corner of the City, where they were beſet with Spies, in caſe any of them ſhould venture upon an Eſcape; which was reaſonably to be expected, not ſo much for their Own ſakes, as to ſave their Families from Periſhing by Hunger. The Alexandrians kept a ſtrict Guard upon That Quarter; and ſo many as they found attempting to get away, they put them firſt to the Torture and then to Death; and no Cruelty was thought too much for them. There was Another Body of Theſe Brutes that planted themſelves upon the River-ſide, to lie in wait there for the Jewiſh Merchants, and their Effects, which they took away in ſight of the Owners, and then Burnt them alive; making uſe of the Cabins, Oars, and the Timber of the Veſſel for the Fuel. Others were Burnt in the Middle of the City, and in a way much more Terrible; for they made uſe of Bruſh-wood inſtead of Billets, and when they had kindled it, they threw the Miſerable Wretches into the Fire; but the Branches being Moiſt and Green, the Smoak was ſtronger than the Flame, and left no Coals behind. There were ſeveral drawn Alive too, with Ropes and Cords through the Streets, and croſs the Market-place; the Multitude Inſulting over their Bodies even when they were Dead: For after the Quartering, and Cutting of them Piece-meal, they trampl'd them under Foot, and with more than Brutal Cruelty would not let one Bit of them appear to entitle them to a Burial.

Now the Governour of the Province, that might have put a ſtop to the Courſe of This Popular Fury, with a Word ſpeaking, if he had had a mind to't: This Governour, I ſay, pretended a downright Ignorance all this while of the very Things he ſaw and heard, which was as good as a Commiſſion to them in what they did, and an Encouragement to worſe. There were Meeting-Houſes, or Places of Prayer up and down the City in abundance; and there it was, that the People, in vaſt Bodies, diſcharg'd their Venom next: In ſome Places by Grubbing up their Groves and Trees; in Others, they demoliſh'd the Houſes from Top to Bottom: In Some again, they committed all to the Flames; but in ſuch a Tranſport of Rage and Madneſs, that the Fire took the adjoyning Buildings; as 'tis hard putting a ſtop to a Conflagration where there's Combuſtible Matter to work upon. To ſay nothing of the Monumental and Illuſtrious Memorials, that were ſet up by ſeveral of the Roman Emperours, in Honour of the Jews, and were all conſum'd at the ſame time; as Bucklers, Crowns, and Garlands, Gilt Statues, with their Titles, and Inſcriptions, &c. which all People had a Veneration for. But the Faction was at that time ſtark Mad.

And now to fortify themſelves yet more in the Prince's Favour, and to ſecure Caius likewiſe, all that was poſſible, in the Execution of his Bloody Deſigns; they apply'd themſelves to New Arts of Flattery, and Inſinuation, and This was the way they went to work.

There were a great many Oratories, where the Jews would have been too Strong for the Rioters if it had come to a Scuffle; and theſe they durſt not venture on, either to Burn, or to pull down; ſo that they bethought themſelves of Another way of Proceeding, and how they might deſtroy their Worſhip and their Manners, both in one; that is to ſay, they erected Caius's Statue in all the Meeting-places that they could not Demoliſh; and in the Chief of them, a Chariot with Four Horſes of Braſs; an Invention that ſeveral Officious Zealots were ſo fond of, as for want of Others, to make uſe of Old Ruſty Jades, without either Ears, Tails, or Legs, being taken out of the Gymnaſium, or Place of Exerciſe, and, as they ſay, dedicated of old to Cleopatra, the Great Grandmother of the Laſt Queen of That Name. Now whether this was well or ill done, let any Mortal Judge: I mean, the Dedication of That to an Emperour, that had been firſt dedicated to a Woman: beſides that it was Old, and out of Faſhion, over and above, and in that reſpect below the Acceptance of an Imperial Patron: How ſhould they imagine, that a Vain, a Haughty, and a Violent Prince, ſhould ever be pleas'd with any thing ſo like a Mockery, under the Cover of a Reverential Reſpect! And yet they had the Face to value themſelves upon the Merit of what they had done, and to expect a Reward for't. But the Service they laid the Greateſt Streſs upon, was the turning of ſo many Oratories into New Temples, and encreaſing the Number of them; wherein they did not ſo much conſult the Honour of their Maſter, as the Gratifying of their own Paſſions, in wreaking their Spite all manner of ways upon the Jews. Now this is all as clear as the Sun. As for Example: There were a matter of Ten Kings, in the Space of Three Hundred Years; and not ſo much as One Image or Statue, conſecrated to any of them; notwithſtanding that they treated them at the ſame time, in the Style and Title of Gods. 'Tis true, they knew them to be but Men all this while, when they made Gods of them. And why not a God of a Man, as well as a God of a Serpent, a Crocodile, a Bird, a Beaſt, a Fiſh, Fiſh and the like? as we find in the Ægyptian Temples; Altars, and Groves that are Conſecrated to the Honour of Thoſe Creatures.

But as theſe People are the Groſſeſt Flaterers under the Sun, and Court Princes for their Fortunes, rather than for their Perſons, and Virtues; they will be anſwering perhaps, that as the Emperours are Greater, and more Conſiderable than the Ptolemies, ſo 'tis but Reaſonable they ſhould have more Honour done them than the Other. A Moſt Ridiculous Pretence! For at that rate, why had not Tiberius the ſame Honours done him before Caius to whom Caius ſtood indebted for the Empire: A Prince, that after a Reign of Three and Twenty Years, both at Sea and Land, did not leave ſo much as the leaſt Spark, or Proſpect of a War, either in Greece, or Barbary; but lived in the conſtant Poſſeſſion of a Peace, and in the enjoyment of the Bleſſings of it, to his Dying Day. And yet Tiberius, after all this had none of theſe Honours done him. Was it for want of Blood, and Family, to entitle him to This Preferment? No no; there was no Defect That way for he was much Superiour to Caius both by Father and Mother. Or can it be ſaid that he did not underſtand Men and Buſineſs? No Man of his Time certainly made a Truer Judgment of Things, or Diſcourſed Matters better. And for his Years then, never any Prince, or Emperour, had the Reputation of being Wiſe Sooner or of Growing Old more to his Honour: inſomuch that he was celebrated for the Early Pregnancy of his Underſtanding, by the Diſtinguiſhing Character of the Old Young Prince.

And yet This Incomparable Prince muſt be paſſed over, to make way for Caius, a Prince, that by his Virtue, has in a manner ſurmounted the very Frailties of Humane Nature; and entitled himſelf, by the Bravery, Conduct, and Juſtice of his Adminiſtration, to the Venerable Name of Auguſtus: Not as an Hereditary Honour tranſmitted to him from his Anceſtors, but a Glorious Title, that Began in himſelf and will deſcend to his Poſterity.

The Whole World was in a Flame both at Sea and Land when This Mighty Prince came to the Government. The Quarrel in ſhort was Empire; the Maritime, and the Mediterranean Provinces engaged in it under the Command of the braveſt Men among the Romans, Party againſt Party, and the greateſt part of the World concerned in the Diſpute; Nation againſt Nation, and People againſt People, to the Degree of endangering a Total Devaſtation, in the Conſequences of ſo Bloudy a Conteſt: For not only the Happineſs but the very Being of Mankind was at Stake upon the Iſſue, if Providence, in the Critical Nick of This Juncture, when their Hearts were ready to ſink under the Burden, had not raiſed up a Prince of an Illuſtrious Family, like a Guardian Angel, to their Deliverance. And This Prince was That Cæſar, that by Charming the Winds and the Waves, and Laying the Storm, ſettled the whole Race of Mankind in an Univerſal Peace: The Prince that brought a Remedy for all Sores, that had ſpread themſelves Eaſt, Weſt, North, and South, thorough all Quarters: This was He, that in his own Single Perſon, ſet all the Provinces at Liberty, and put an end both to Wars and Robberies; and when he had cleared the Seas of Pirates, he Repleniſhed them again with Veſſels of Trade and Commerce; and brought Order out of Confuſion, reducing the Moſt Barbarous and Inhoſpitable of Nations, to a Temper of Society and Good Nature; and making all the Towns as Eaſie as if they had been perfectly Free. He maintained Peace, and Adminiſter'd Juſtice, and to Scatter his Bounties and Good Graces among the People, in ſo Generous a way of Profuſion, that they wanted for nothing: And This was his Courſe and Practice to the End of his Days. And yet after all Theſe Obligations, to ſo great, and Glorious a Benefactor, and the Three-and-Forty-Years Government of Egypt, over and above, there was no Talk of Statues, or Images to his Honour in any of their Oratories. But yet if any Mortal could pretend a Title to a Reſpect ſo New and Extraordinary, This Prince of all Men living had certainly the Faireſt Right to it; not only, as the Author of the Auguſt Imperial Family; and the beſt Deſerving from all Mankind: but for taking the Power out of Many Hands into One, and aſſuming the Care of it to Himſelf, as a Prince perfectly Skilled in the Art of Government: It was well ſaid, that Sovereignty is not to be divided, for many Voices are the Cauſe of many Miſchiefs. And This is not all neither, for the whole World had Decreed him Divine Honours, as Temples, Groves, Portico's, and ſuch Pieces of Curioſity and State, that New or Old, Ancient or Modern, the World does not afford the like: Eſpecially That Temple of Cæſar's in Alexandria, under the Name of Sebaſtian, a Piece incomparably above all others. It ſtands Situate, over againſt a moſt Commodious Harbour; wonderful High, and Large in Proportion, and an Eminent Sea-mark; full of Choice Paintings and Statues, with Donatives and Oblations in Abundance, and then it is Beautified all over with Gold and Silver; the Model Curious, and Regular in the Diſpoſition of the Parts, as Galleries, Libraries, ries, Porches, Courts, Halls, Walks, and Conſecrated Groves, as Glorious as Expence and Art could make them, and every thing in the Proper Place: Beſide that the Hope and Comfort of Sea-faring Men either coming In or going Out. Shall any Man think now that in ſuch a Caſe as This, and in ſo univerſal a Conſent and Concourſe of Nations, any thing was wanting, that was juſtly Due to the Honour of Cæſar, without ſetting up the Statues in the Jews Oratories. No Man in his Right Wits can ſay there was. But why was it omitted then? Hear, and I'll tell you.

They underſtood the Generoſity and Juſtice of Cæſar ſo well, that they knew he would be as Tender of the Rights and Privileges of the ſeveral Provinces, as of the Ceremonies of Rome it ſelf: But he did not think fit however to reject the Good Will of his Blind Flatterers, not that he approved of the Thing, but the Dignity of the Empire required it, as an Artificial way of creating a Veneration for the Government. Neither was he one jot puffed up with the Complimental Offers, as it appears by This, that he would never ſuffer himſelf to be treated in the Stile of God, or Maſter; ſo great an Averſion he had to ſo Servile a way of Adulation. Nay he would not ſtick to declare himſelf well ſatisfied with the Jews Refuſal to comply with This Abominable Practice: He would never have ſuffered ſo conſiderable a Part of the City beyond Tyber elſe, to continue in the Poſſeſſion of the Jews, the Greater Part of them being Free-men too, that is to ſay, Men that having been Priſoners of War, were ſet at Liberty by their Maſters to live according to the Laws of their Country and Profeſſion. He was no Stranger to the Nature of their Oratories, and their Worſhip there on the Sabbath Days, eſpecially, according to the Practice of their Fore-Fathers. He knew well enough too, of the Collections they made, and the ſending of them up to Jeruſalem, under the Name of Firſt-Fruits; and of Miniſters they had to offer Sacrifice for them; and yet he neither turned them out of the City, nor puniſhed them otherwiſe, as he might have done. Nay and in Palæſtine it ſelf, the Jews were allowed the Liberty of their Countrys Worſhip, without putting any Check or Reſtraint upon them, either in the Matter of their Oratories, or in the Freedom of their Legiſlative Aſſemblies. Neither did he ſhew any Diſlike to the Solemn Cuſtom of Offering up of Firſt-Fruits; but on the contrary, he had ſo great a Reverence for our Holy Worſhip, that we have the Preſents yet to ſhew, of almoſt all his Domeſticks, in That Temple of ours, in token of his Approbation: Beſide his expreſs Order for the Offering up of Daily Sacrifices to the Moſt High God, at his own Charge, which Cuſtom is in Practice to This Day, and will continue ſo for ever as a Monument to the Everlaſting Honour of This Pious Emperour. And then upon any Occaſion of a Monthly Diſtribution of Money and Corn to be made among the People, he took care that the Jews might have their Proportion of the Charity: Or if the Day for the diſpoſing of it happened to fall out upon the Jews Sabbath, when our People were not allowed either to Give, or Take, or to do any ſort of Work, eſpecially for Profit, the Officers were commanded to reſerve Their Share apart for them, till the next Day. This Generous Tenderneſs gave the Jews ſo great a Reputation in the World, that it kept their very Enemies in Awe, from breaking in upon the Sacredneſs of their Privileges.

The Jews were as Eaſie alſo, under Tiberius, as under Auguſtus, though Sejanus did what he could to irritate him againſt them, and to Embroil Italy in new Troubles. Now Tiberius quickly found, after the Miſerable Death of Sejanus, that the Stories he had told him were only Calumny, and Malice; and that Sejanus's Buſineſs was only to clear the City of the Jews, as the Men the moſt likely of all others to Oppoſe his Impious Deſign upon the Life of the Emperour: who, upon This, ſent Orders immediately to all the Governours of Provinces, to be kind to the Jews wherever they found them; ſome very few excepted, but for preſſing any Innovations upon them, in matters of Worſhip; That was not to be endured, for he looked upon them to be a Peaceable, and a Good ſort of People, and found nothing in their Laws, Lives, and Manners, but what was very Agreeable to the Meaſures of a Well-ordered Government.

CHAP. X.

One Helicon an Ægyptian, formerly a Slave, and at preſent a Favourite, exaſperates Caius againſt the Alexandrian Jews.

CAius was now ſo Puffed up with Pride and Vanity, that he really Took himſelf for the God he Pretended to be: And no People ſo forward, either Greeks or Barba-

Barbarians, to Countenance the Phrenſy, as Theſe Alexandrians; who are certainly the moſt Artificial Diſſemblers, Flatterers and Hypocrites under the Cope of Heaven. They have Smooth Tongues, Words at will, and the beſt Qualified Men in nature for the overturning of a State and laying all in Confuſion. He that would be well informed of the Veneration that Theſe Religious People have for the Dreadful Name of God, needs but conſider that they Treat their Ibes, their Aſps, and ſeveral other Animals, in the ſame Style, whereby Men are eaſily Impoſed upon, that are not well aware of the Horrid Impiety of the Ægyptians; but for Thoſe that underſtand their Humour, and make a Right Judgment of Things, they lie as Open to them as the Day. Now Caius was ſo Beſotted, as to think that the Alexandrians believed him to be a God, in good earneſt: for they acted their Part ſo well, that there was no Difference in appearance betwixt a Falſe Worſhip, and a True; the Acclamations, and the External Formalities being the very ſame. This Groſs Miſtake made him reflect upon all the Extravagances of a Sacrilegious Zeal together with the Late Affronts upon the Oratories in particular, as an Impulſe of Conſcience, and Affection. He had an Account ſent him daily from Alexandria, of Theſe Tranſactions, and no Poem or Hiſtory could have been ſo welcome to him: Nor any Intelligencers ſo fit for his Turn, as his own Domeſticks, to Gratifie the Humour of their Maſter in the ſame Likings and Diſlikes. The Greater Part of them were Ægyptians; an Abject, Vile ſort of People, Train'd up in the Worſhip of Serpents, and Crocodiles, and Corrupted Body and Soul. The Head of This Abominable Troop was one Helico, a Mean, and a Wicked Wretch, that by Lewd Arts had wrought himſelf into the Court. He had ſomewhat of the Scholar in him, that he got under his Firſt Maſter, whoſe Slave he was, and He afterwards made a Preſent of him to Tiberius Cæſar. But the Princes Genius leading him to what was Grave, and Serious, and Helico's Talent lying altogether upon the Buffoon, he took no pleaſure in him at all. Nay, on the Contrary, he had a Natural Averſion, even in his Youth, for all things that were Trivial and Light. But upon Tiberius's departing This Life, and Caius ſucceeding to the Empire, Helico conſidered with himſelf, that he had now Another Game to play, with his new Maſter, who he ſaw was a Prince wholly abandoned to all manner of Vitious Licence.

" Well, ſays Helico to himſelf, the Bleſſed Hour is now at hand, wherefore rouze, and " beſtir thy ſelf. Thou haſt a Maſter to thy very Hearts Wiſh; and thou haſt That " Maſter to thy ſelf at Pleaſure: A Turn of Wit, agreeable enough, and a Faculty " of Droll and Banter, no Man better; to ſay nothing of Pleaſant Conceits, Mirth, " Joques and Raillery, Peculiar to thy ſelf. Thou art equally the Maſter of Arts, Li- " beral and Illiberal. Thy Tongue is well enough hung too, to cut a Hair betwixt Sa- " tyr, and Flattery; eſpecially when thou haſt a Prince in thy Power that takes delight " in calumny, and Reproach: For his Ears are always Open, thou knoweſt, to Foul " and Falſe ſpeaking. And then never trouble thy Head to look further for Matter, ſo long " as thou haſt the Jews Laws and Ceremonies to work upon: And This is a Point of " Skill that thou haſt been inſtructed in from thy very Cradle; not from any one " Maſter, but from the Clamorous, and Bawling Part of the Alexandrian Rabble. This " is the Caſe; and prethee let us ſee what thou art the better for thy Learning.

Helico's, Head was ſo ſet upon This Whimſical Freak, that he would never let Caius be Quiet for him, Night nor Day, but be breaking in upon him ſtill in the very Privacy of his Receſſes; entertaining him with Squinting, Double-edged Stories, betwixt Jeſt and Earneſt; and the ſharper the Pleaſanter. But his way was not to play the Informer Bare-faced, or to own himſelf for what he was, but he did the Jews more Miſchief by a Side-Wind, and under the Diſguiſe of a Hint, or an Alluſion, than he could have done in the Quality of a Profeſſed Enemy.

When the Alexandrian Ambaſſadors came to underſtand the Menage of this Intrigue, they made it their Buſineſs to bring Helico over into their Intereſt; ſome ſay, by Great Summs of Money in hand, or at leaſt by Large Promiſes, both of Treaſure and of Honour, ſo ſoon as Caius ſhould come to Alexandria. It ran mightily in the Head of Helico to think of the Reſpects he was to receive, in the Preſence, not only of his Maſter, but of ſo many Eminent Perſons as would be ſure to appear from all Quarters upon ſo Solemn an Occaſion; and in Veneration to ſo Great a Prince. So that Helico promis'd fair in the Concluſion.

We had been hitherto ſo taken up with the Thought of our known and open Enemies, that we never ſo much as Dreamt of the Danger of a Secret One, in the Perſon of Helico. But when we came to find our Miſtake, we made a Tryal to work upon him by Flattery, and Fair Words, as the Man of the whole World we had the moſt Reaſon to Dread, for he was in with Caius at all his Exerciſes, Liberties, and Entertainments; as Balls, Wraſtling, Bathing, Feaſting, beſide all manner of Senſual Pleaſures. And which is more than all the reſt, he was the Firſt Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, ſo that upon all Occaſions he was ſure of the Emperour's Ear. His Diſcourſes were much at the rate of a Scurrilous Buffoon, and yet ſo temper'd betwixt Sweet and Sowre, that they were at the ſame time the Sharpeſt, and the moſt Agreeable Mixture, that could be imagin'd; it being his Principal Deſign to Pleaſe Caius, and at the ſame time to Ruine Us, by Scandal and Subornations; though the Former fell in only by the Bye, and the Other was in Truth his Main Buſineſs. But in the End, out comes Story upon Story ſo Artificially put together, and improv'd with ſuch Aggravations, that the Impreſſion was never to be Forgotten or Defac'd.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews of Alexandria ſend Deputies to Caius, with an Account of their Grievances, and Philo the Chief of their Embaſſie.

WHEN we had done all that was poſſible toward a better underſtanding with Helico, and found him ſo intolerably Proud, and Inacceſſible, that there was no ſpeaking to him, we let That Project fall, and bethought our ſelves of Another Expedient, which ſeem'd no leſs Neceſſary, and yet more likely to take effect, not knowing all This while, but it might be ſome Perſonal and Particular Pique againſt the Jews, that made him fall ſo Spitefully upon Us. Now the Courſe we took was This: It was thought Reaſonable to preſent Caius with a Petition, in the Nature of a Remonſtrance of all our Grievances, and a Prayer for Relief. This Petition was, in truth, but the Abſtract of a Longer Addreſs, that was deliver'd a little before to King Agrippa, when he call'd at Alexandria in his way to Syria, to take Poſſeſſion of a Government the Emperour had conferr'd upon him. We were Thus far advanced in our way toward Rome, under a great Miſtake, it ſeems; for whereas we made no doubt of finding Caius a Prince of Honour and Juſtice, he prov'd, on the contrary, the moſt Implacable Enemy we had to do withall; but with the Words, and Countenance, and under the Mask ſtill of a Generous Friend. It was in the Field of Mars; (a Field near Tyber) that he ſaluted and received us, and ſo he gave us to underſtand by a Sign of his Right Hand, that we were heartily welcome; he ſent Homulus alſo the Introducer of Ambaſſadours, to tell us, he would take Cognizance of our Cauſe at Leiſure: which made all People conclude, both Jews and Strangers, that Our Buſineſs was as good as done. But Wiſdom and Experience taught me better things, than to Judge by Appearances, and ſo That which pleas'd the reſt of the Company troubled me, and gave me a Jealouſie upon the Main; whereupon I Reaſoned the Matter thus with my ſelf. " Here are Ambaſſadours from all Parts of the " World; and what's the meaning of it, that the Jews are only to be heard; beſide " that they are known to be Jews, and a People that will content themſelves to " ſtand upon the ſame Level with the Reſt. But for Us, in fine, to expect a Privi- " lege from a Stranger, a Young, and a Free Prince, would be next Door to Mad- " neſs. He is Partial to the Alexandrians without Diſpute, and it is for Their ſakes, " that he preſſes the Matter to an Iſſue. I ſhould be glad to ſee him an Indifferent " Arbitratour betwixt Party and Party, but I Dread the Thought of finding him an " Advocate for Them, and an Enemy to Us.

CHAP. XII.

Caius orders Petronius the Governour of Syria, to ſet up his Statue in the Temple of Jeruſalem: Philo and his Colleagues are inform'd of it.

THESE Thoughts kept me Waking, and in This Anxiety I was ſurpriz'd with a Diſmal Accident not to be foreſeen, and an Accident that boaded Deſtruction to the whole Nation of the Jews. There was no importuning of Caius in the Matter, and ſo we only follow'd him out of Town to Puteoli, whither he went to take the Air of the Sea-ſide, and to divert himſelf from Place to Place, in the ſight of Goodly Towns and Palaces, which are thereabouts in Abundance. While we were waiting there in daily Expectation of an Audience, and highly ſollicitous what would become of our Cauſe; up comes a Man to us, Trembling, and out of Breath; with his Eyes Blood-ſhotten; and after ſtanding a while at Gaze, he withdrew a little out of Hearing, for there was Company by. And hark ye, ſays he ſoftly, do you hear any News? and as he was going to tell ſomething, he guſh'd out into Tears that put put a ſtop to his Speech. He offer'd at it again and again, and was ſtill prevented But ſeeing him at laſt ſo Frightful a Spectacle, we beſought him to tell us what he came thither for, unleſs he came purely for Crying-ſake; but if there was any Matter of Moment that was worth the while, we begg'd our Parts of it, for Mourning was our Daily Exerciſe: But in the End, after many a Sigh and Sob, Our Temple, ſays he, is utterly Ruin'd; for Caius has commanded his Image to be ſet up in the Sanctuary, with Jupiter's Name upon it. This Dreadful News ſtruck us all Senſeleſs that heard it, and the Truth of it was quickly confirm'd by ſeveral Others. Upon This, we all withdrew together into a Cloſet, where we ſhut up our ſelves, and there condol'd our Misfortunes, Publick and Private; as Grief is Talkative, and will never want Matter to work upon.

Little did we think, when we committed our ſelves to the Hazards of Raging Seas, and a Tedious Winter-Voyage, to deliver us from our Perſecuting Oppreſſors; Little did We think, I ſay, of a Storm at Land, and that the Saddeſt Part of our Calamity was yet to come, for Winter-Blaſts are but according to the Courſe of Nature, in the Diſtinguiſhing of the Seaſons; and the Works of Nature, are but in Other Terms, the Operations of Providence, in order to the Common Good of Mankind. But the Author of This Tempeſt has nothing either of Humane or Prudent in him; a Turbulent and an Ambitious Young Man; and ſo much the more Dangerous, for having the Power of the whole Empire to ſupport him. For who ſhould dare to intercede in Caſe of Need, or but ſo much as open his Mouth upon the Temple's Behalf, to the moſt Sacrilegious Enemy of all Men living; for it would be againſt Common Senſe, to expect Mercy out of Cruelty; and to depoſite the Hopes of our Preſervation, in the Hands of our Perſecutors: A Temple as Venerable all over the World as the Sun in the Firmament, and we may be ſure, that He that refuſes to ſpare That Temple will ſpare Nothing.

" Well! and why ſhould not we Die then! eſpecially when he that lays down " One Life for the Laws and Religion of his Country, is ſure of a Life more Glorious " in Exchange. But He muſt be a Mad Man at laſt however, that caſts away a Life " at this rate, which no body is the better for. So that ſuch an Inſtance as This " would but be the Addition of one more to the Roll of our Former Calamities: " eſpecially, we being here under the Character of Ambaſſadours; and in a Point " where the Principals are more concern'd than the Deputies. Nay, we ſhall not " want Envious and Malignant Spirits over and above, and of our own People too, " to make the Worſt of Things, and to impute any Glorious Reſolution to a Wrong " Cauſe. The Ambaſſadors, they'll ſay, found themſelves at a Plunge, and ſo quitted " their Station, deſerting the Common-wealth when they found it in Danger, in or- " der to the promoting of their own Private Intereſt. But the Leſs muſt give way to " the Greater: Private Matters to Publick, and where-ever This Order is Broken, or " Confounded, the whole Government is at Stake, and out of Frame; and in one " Word, where the Polity of the Jews comes once to be Subjected to the Queſtion, " 'tis a Step toward the Aboliſhing of the very Name of the Nation, where there is " an Agreement of Power and Good-will in the doing of it. We cannot, in fine, a- " bandon the Alexandrian Jews, for the whole Nation of the Jews is at Stake upon " it, being Falſe to our Selves; and it is to be fear'd, that This Cruel Oppreſſor will " Extirpate us all from off the Face of the Earth. It will be ſaid, perhaps, That if " we can make nothing of it either way, we are at Liberty to come off at laſt, in " Caſe of the worſt. To which I anſwer; He that makes ſuch a Propoſition, has " neither Courage nor Scripture in him. Generous Natures will hope the beſt, and " Holy Writ lays the Foundation of That Hope, to all Thoſe that heartily em- " brace the Doctrine; and who knows now at laſt, but This may be for a Tryal of " our Conſtancy and Virtue in the worſt of Fortunes. Adieu then to all Worldly Com- " forts and Supports: They are Falſe and Fickle, and leave us when we have moſt " need of them. Adieu, I ſay, to Vain Confidences, and let us caſt our ſelves in " a Firm and Lively Faith upon the Goodneſs of God; who hath ſo often deliver'd " us already, and will never forſake us. After this manner we Comforted our ſelves, and one another, in all Caſes of Surprize, and in the Hopes of Better Times.

When we had gone Thus far, and after a ſhort Pauſe, we apply'd our ſelves to the Bearer of This Diſmal News. " You do not conſider, we told him, That what " you have ſaid as yet, is but as ſo many Live-Coals thrown into our Ears as you " have utter'd Words; for you have only told us the Matter of Fact, which ſignifies " nothing to our Satisfaction without the Reaſon of it, and without knowing what " it was tranſported the Emperour into this Horrid Reſolution.

" Why then, ſays the other, to tell you That which every Body knows, Caius has " a mind to paſs for a God, and looking upon the Jews as the only People likely to " oppoſe him in his Blaſphemous Pretence; he reſolv'd, if poſſible, to remove That " Obſtacle out of the way, toward the Facilitating of the Work. And This could " not be better done, he thought, than by beginning with a Contempt and Indigni- " ty upon the Holy Temple, which was allow'd at all Hands to be the moſt Glorious " Piece in the Univerſe, both for Ornament, and a Vaſt Treaſure, in Preſents and " Oblations which had been ſo many Years a Gathering, and which Caius, in the " Concluſion, had the Face and Confidence to aſſume to himſelf. Beſide that he was " now further Exaſperated by Capito the Quæſtor; which Capito was alſo the Re- " ceiver of the Tributes in Judea, and a Fellow that by his Actions and Oppreſſions, " had made himſelf Odious to all the Provinces. He came thither Poor, and when " he had ſo enrich'd himſelf by Fraud and Corruption, that he was afraid of being " call'd to an Account for't, he found it his beſt way to complain Firſt; and to pre- " vent an Accuſation with a Calumny, by the Emprovement of an Opportunity that " lay fair for his Purpoſe.

" Jamnia is a City of Judæa, wonderfully Populous, and the Inhabitants, all Jews; " ſome few Strangers excepted, that to our Coſt came thither out of the Bordering " Countries to make Acquaintances, or as we ſay, to ſee Faſhions: over and above " that, they are never without ſome Plot or other againſt the Laws and Cuſtoms of " the Jews. So ſoon as ever Theſe People came to underſtand the Extravagant Am- " bition of Caius after Divine Honours, and his Deadly Malice to the whole Jewiſh " Nation: Matters being now Ripe for a Plot, they preſently cauſed an Altar to be " erected, of Clay wrought into Bricks out of pure Spite to the Citizens: for they " knew well enough, that This Violation of our Laws would prove the Ground of " a Quarrel; and ſo they found it: For the Jews gather'd together preſently, and " Demoliſh'd the Altar, the other Party applying themſelves to Capito for Redreſs. " Now Capito was the Author and Contriver of the whole Tragedy, and bleſſing him- " ſelf to ſee every Thing ſucceed ſo to his Wiſh, he ſent an Account of it immedi- " ately to Caius, with enflaming Aggravations to make the Matter look worſe than it " was. This Arrogant Hot-headed Prince, had no ſooner receiv'd the Intelligence, " but he preſently gave Order for the Erecting of a Glorious Coloſſus in the Temple " of Jeruſalem, in Revenge of the Brick Altar that was pull'd down in Jamnia; and " This was done by the Counſel of his Two Doughty Adviſers, Helico, the Court- " Buffoon, and Apelles the Tragedian; who from a Proſtitute in his Youth, went over " afterwards to be an Actor upon the Stage, a ſort of People that are look'd upon in " their Theatrical Liberties to be the Looſeſt and the moſt Shameleſs of all Profeſſions. " And Theſe were the Men that Caius pitch'd upon to inſtruct him in the Arts of Singing " and Railery, without ſo much as ever thinking of the Duties of Juſtice, and the " Care of maintaining the Publick Peace. Thus did Helico, like a Scorpion attack " the Jews with an Egyptian Venom, and Apelles at the ſame time, as an Aſcalonite, that " is to ſay, as a Member of a Nation that's never to be reconciled to the Bordering Jews.

Every Word of This Relation, with the very Names of the Perſons that were mention'd in it, went to the Hearts of us; but the Learned Counſellors liv'd in a ſhort time after, to receive Rewards according to their Deſerts. Apelles was taken up, laid in Chains, and put to Exquiſite Tortures, and ſo conſequently to a Lingring Death: And Helico was afterwards put to Death by Claudius the Succeſſor of Caius.

CHAP. XIII.

Petronius finds Great Difficulty to execute the Order of Caius for erecting his Statue in the Temple of Jeruſalem.

AND now came Caius's Order for the Conſecrating and Erecting of his Statue; which was drawn with all the Caution in the World to ſecure the Execution of it. As particularly, Petronius, the Governour of Syria, was expreſly command- ed to draw out one Half of the Army that lay upon the River Euphrates, as a Guard of Defence againſt any Inroads and Incurſions of the Eaſtern Kings or Nations; and with theſe Troops to attend the Statue, not for the Solemnity of the Dedication, but for a Terrour to any that ſhould dare to oppoſe it. Ah Cruel Prince! ſays Petroni- us to himſelf, when Thou thy ſelf knoweſt before-hand, that theſe People will rather Die a Thouſand Deaths, than ſubmit to ſuch an Impoſition. And then what ſignifies the cal- ling of an Army, but in order to the Conſecrating of the Villainy with the Blood of ſo many Thouſands of Innocents.

Petronius was miſerably divided within himſelf upon This Commiſſion. There was Danger in Refuſing; Danger in Delaying; and Danger again in the very ſhuffling of of it off: beſide the infinite Difficulties on the other hand in caſe of a Complyance; for he made no doubt at all of the Jews ſtanding out all Extremities, at what Hazzard ſoever. All Nations are Tender and Jealous of their Privileges and Cuſtoms, but the Jews, above all others; they look upon their Laws to be no leſs than Divine Oracles, and they are train'd up to the Love and Study of them, from their Cradles. They bear them in their Hearts, and the more they think of them, the greater Reverence they have for them. They treat all their Proſelytes, with the Privileges of Free Citizens, and the Veneration they have for the Dignity of their Profeſſion, is ſo Sacred, that they would rather part with any thing, than the leaſt Scruple of their Duty. But the High Eſteem they have for their Holy Temple, ſurpaſſeth all the reſt: Witneſs the Law that makes it Death without Mercy, for any Man to ſet Foot within the Sanctuary, whereas the reſt is open indifferently to all of their own Nation from what Province ſoever they come.

This was a Matter of ſo great Importance, that Petronius bethought himſelf over and over upon it, without coming to a Reſolution; but in Concluſion he call'd a kind of a Council upon the Queſtion, and upon ſumming up all Arguments and Opinions the Reſult was This. That there muſt be no Innovations in Matter of Religion. Firſt, Becauſe Nature and Equity are Both againſt it: And, Secondly, For fear of Unhappy Conſequences, not only from God Himſelf, but from the Paſſions of Violent and Revengeful Men. He took into his Thought alſo, The Prodigious Extent of This Populous Nation: A People, not Coop'd up in this or that Quarter, like other Men, but diſpers'd over the World; the Iſlands as well as the Continent. So that upon the Computation, the Jews are reckon'd to be well-nigh as Numerous as all the reſt. Now, ſays Petronius, how far it may ſtand with the Reaſon of the Caſe, to provoke ſo many Myriads of Men into one Common Confederacy, may deſerve a further Conſideration; for all Theſe Multitudes united into one Maſs, would be able to drive the whole Earth before them. To ſay nothing of the vaſt Numbers in Judæa it ſelf; a Brave, Hardy, and a Well-Diſciplin'd ſort of People, that had much rather undergo a Generous Death, than outlive the Laws and Religion of their Country: How Barbarous ſoever in the Opinion of their Enemies, yet in Truth and Effect, moſt Generous and Noble.

The Governour had Another Jealouſie alſo, of the Troops on the other ſide of the Euphrates; as Babylon, and ſeveral other Provinces, that to his certain knowledge were in the Intereſt of the Jews: For, ſays he, they ſent their Yearly Contributions of Holy Treaſure, as they call it, up to the Temple under the Name of Firſt-Fruits, and they all came ſafe, though the Ways were Difficult and Dangerous; as what is it, that Piety and Reſolution will not make Eaſie? But the main Difficulty is yet behind: which was, that upon the Firſt Tidings of This New Dedication, they would immediately take the Field, march directly up to them, Beſet and Surround them, and then cut them to pieces.

When Petronius had been thinking a while at This rate, back and forward, he paſs'd a ſhort Reflection or Two upon the Humour and the Character of his Maſter. The Perſon, ſays he, under whoſe Command I am now to act, is a Young Prince. His Will is his Law, and whether it be Juſt or Not, Right or Wrong, 'tis equally Dangerous to Oppoſe, either the one or the other, or to Diſtinguiſh one from t'other, but by This Meaſure. If he ſays he's a God, who ſhall dare to ſay the Contrary? So that in This Caſe, 'tis as much as a Man's Life is worth, either to Obey, or Not. The one way, a Man is liable to the Chance of War; (which in truth is but Doubtful:) and the other way the Diſobedience is certain Death.

CHAP. XIV.

Petronius ſets People at work upon the Statue; the Principals of the Jews refuſe to receive it. They get leave to ſend their Deputies to the Emperour about it.

THE Roman Officers that ſerv'd under Petronius in the Government of Syria, were all of them for a War, giving for Granted, That in Caſe of Declining it, the Firſt Fury of the Emperour's Diſpleaſure would fall upon them as the Heads of a Sedition. So that it was ſo much Time clear gain'd, as was ſpent in Deliberations and Put-offs, till the Statue might be got ready; for there was none brought out of Italy; nor ſo much as any Order taken for the Beſt that might be found in Syria, which was a Special Act of Providence in Favour of God's People; for the Tumult would have broken out elſe before they could have made any Proviſion againſt it: for a Man is not half Himſelf in the Hurry of a Surprize.

Wherefore

Wherefore Petronius gave Order for a Statue to be made; and ſent for the Greateſt Maſters of Phœnicia, to adviſe withal about it, Supplied them with all Materials, and Sidon was the Place appointed for the Work. He ſent Notice likewiſe of the Emperours Pleaſure to the High Prieſts and Eminent Officers of the Jews, adviſing by all means to Submit cheerfully to their Maſters Pleaſure, for fear of worſe Conſequences. For the Syrian Troops, he told them, had their Particular Orders to lay the whole Country waſt with Fire and Sword, in Caſe of Diſobedience. Now Petronius went This way to work, upon an Opinion that if he could but Mollifie the Great ones, the Reſt would follow in Courſe. But he was wonderfully out in his Conjecture; for the very Mention of the Thing ſtruck them into ſuch a Conſternation, that they burſt out into ſo Profuſe an Exceſs of Weeping, as if their Eyes had been Fountains of Tears, and all This without one Word ſpeaking: And from thence they paſſed into Phrantick Violences of Tearing their Hair, and their Beards, and ſo by Degrees into Lamentations in Words at length.

" And have we lived now, they cryed, to See, That at This Time of Day that that " none of our Four Fathers ever ſo much as Thought of! But what do we talk of " Seeing any Thing without Eyes to ſee withal? For, rather than entertain Thoſe " Eyes we have, with a Spectacle ſo Impious aud Execrable, that a body cannot ſo " much as Hear or Think of it without Horrour: rather than ſo, I ſay, we'll part with " our Eyes and our Miſerable Lives together.

The Fame of This Reſolution was no ſooner gotten into Jeruſalem and ſo up and down into Judea, but the Jews, all as one Man, quitted their Towns, Caſtles, and Dwellings, and drawing into a Body, as by Conſent, they took their March directly toward Phœnicia, to look for Petronius, who was then at his Command. Upon the Firſt ſight of This Prodigious Multitude, ſeveral of Petronius's Friends adviſed him to look to himſelf, for there was a Mighty Army Advancing againſt him, and ſo they took it to be, as believing it impoſſible for the Jews alone to furniſh ſuch a Body.

As the Jews advanced ſtill nearer and nearer, they came at laſt to cover the whole Country as with a Cloud, but without either Arms, all this while, or any thing of Guards, only the Air was filled with Outcries and Lamentations, to Deafen a Body, and when the Noiſe was gone, the Echo ſtill continued. When the Clamorous Part was over, they entertained themſelves with Diſcourſes and Ejaculations ſuitable to the Occaſion. The People marched in Six Diviſions, Old Men, Young Men, and Boys, Old Women, Young Women, and Virgins: Three on the one hand and Three on the Other.

When they came within ſight of Petronius, who was mounted upon a Seat of Eminence, they caſt themſelves upon the Ground before him, all in their Ranks, as Supplicants, and in ſo moving a manner, in the Harmony of their Ways and Actions, as if they had been all governed by one Spirit: neither were they leſs Tender upon the Scruple of Modeſty in their Behaviour, for though Petronius called to them to Riſe and Draw near, it was ſome time before they could be perſuaded to it. But at laſt up they got, and in Sack-Cloath and Aſhes, with their Hands Bound behind them like Condemned Priſoners, they advanced up toward the Governour, where one of the Senators, Addreſſed himſelf to Petronius in Theſe Terms.

" Here we are, ſays he to Petronius, without Arms, to ſhew that we bring " no Hoſtile Intention along with us; but Thoſe Hands that Nature gave us " for the uſe of Arms are put out of Condition to ſerve us in That Capa- " city. We bring our very Bodies at Mercy too, our Wives, Children, and " Families, in the Quality of Petitioners, Firſt to Petronius, and then by thy " Means to Caius. We have not left one Soul at Home, and our Prayer is " either that we may be all Preſerved, or All Deſtroyed. We are naturally " Lovers of Peace, and it is our Intereſt as well as our Inclinations ſo to be, in " Regard of the Benefits we receive from it. When Caius came to the Empire, " and the Notice of it to Vitellius, your Predeceſſor in the Government, and at " that Time living among us, we were the Firſt of all Syria to Gratulate his Acceſſion " to the Sovereignty, and to ſpread the Joyful News of his Elevation thorough o- " ther Cities and Places. was it not Our Temple alſo that Firſt offered up Vows and " Sacrifices for the Happineſs of his Life and Reign? And are We now to be the " Firſt, if not the Only Temple that is to be Deprived of the Exerciſe and Enjoy- " ment of our Religious Worſhip? If the quitting of our Houſes, Privileges, and Poſſeſ- " ſions Publique and Private, may be worth your Acceptance, we are ready to lay them " all at your Feet. And ſo for the matter of Plate, Houſhold-ſtuff, or what's " more Precious, you may have it all for the Asking: and with ſo good a Heart too, " that we ſhall reckon our ſelves upon the Receiving hand, even in what we Give. " And All upon This Single Condition, that the Temple may ſtand as it did, and

" continue Inviolate, as we received it from our Fore-Fathers. Grant us This Sin" gle Requeſt, and we'll ask no more. But if nothing leſs than our Religion will " content you, pray take away our Lives too, without forcing us upon a Life of Tor-
" ment, worſe than a Thouſand Deaths. We are threatned here with Armed Troops
" and Military Executions, if any of us ſhall preſume to obſtruct the intended De- " dication. Why, no Man is ſo Mad, as to ſet himſelf up in Contradiction to his
" Maſter, but let them Strike, Cut and Hack us to Pieces, and do all that a Victori" ous Enemy can pretend to, ſo long as they may do it ſecurely, without any Dan" ger of their own Bloud. But what needs an Army be drawn out for ſuch an Ex" ecution: where there's only a Butchery on the one ſide, and not ſo much as a Defence
" on the other. As for Sacrifices, we may do the work of our own Prieſts, our " ſelves, upon the Victims of our own Wives, Brothers, and Siſters, Sons and " Daughters; and content our ſelves with the Denomination of Men, Women, and " Children Slayers, for Hard Caſes muſt have Hard Names. And what have we to do
" now after ſpilling ſo much Innocent Bloud of other People, but to lay Violent " Hands upon our ſelves, and mingle our own with it too in One Common Maſs!
" Ending our Days at laſt, with This Prayer, in our Mouths, That God will not " be offended with us for an Action that carries along with it ſo Great a Defe" rence to the Authority of the Emperour, and at the ſame time to the Sacredneſs of our " Holy Profeſſion. This will be the Caſe, if we have the Hearts to Contemn a Life that " a Good Man would be aſhamed to lead. There is an Old Story among the Greek
" Fables of Gorgon's Head, that turned every Thing to Stone that did but look up-
" on it. The Report, 'tis true, is but a Fiction, and yet not without ſome Em-
" blematical Reſemblances of Truth, eſpecially in many Accidents of Aſtoniſhment
" and Surprize. The Diſpleaſure of a Maſter is Mortal, or ſomewhat elſe that comes " near it. And now Petronius, do but you imagine, if ſome of our People ſhould
" ſee ſuch a Statue brought into the Temple, as you have here before you (which Hea" ven forbid) would they not look, do you think, like Men turned into Marble
" at the Spectacle! Their Eyes ſet in their Heads, and Nature it ſelf out of Condi" tion for all the Offices of Life? But to come to a Concluſion, we do not deſire
" an abſolute Diſcharge of our Obedience, but Time and Leave only to addreſs our " ſelves by our Deputies, to his Imperial Majeſty for Relief. Who knows but He " may be wrought upon to grant us a Toleration of our Holy Laws and Worſhip,
" and a Liberty in Common with the reſt of the World, for we ask no more, than " what all other Nations enjoy without Exception: in the Preſervation of Thoſe
" Rites and Traditions that we have received Inviolate from our Fore-Fathers, in " Favour both of our Cuſtoms, and Manners. Who knows I ſay, but ſuch a Re-
" monſtrance as This may Mollifie him. The Hearts of Princes are Variable, like " Thoſe of Other People, neither is their Diſpleaſure Immortal. We are wound" ed here with Calumnies, and there's no Remedy like Truth; which is all we have " to offer, and that we may not be Condemned without a Hearing, or, to put it
" at Worſt, what if we ſhould find the Prince Inexorable, the Cauſe is but where it " was, for he may ſtill do the ſame thing Afterward, that he would have done Before.
" And now for our Laſt Requeſt, Petronius, and in the Names of This Vaſt Multi" tude, be but ſo Good and Generous, we beſeech you, as not to oppoſe an Embaſſy
" that has ſo many Thouſands of Lives depending upon it: And pray be pleaſed
" to know that we do not Contend for Profit, but for Piety, in any other ſenſe than
" as Godlineſs is the Greateſt Gain.

CHAP. XV.

Petronius Writes to Caius about the Jews; and gains Time by it. Caius enraged at Petronius, but Diſſembles the Matter.

THIS Remonſtrance was received by Great and Small, with all the Tenderneſs and Compaſſion imaginable, as appeared by their Looks, Actions, Geſtures, and Behaviour upon the Hearing of it. And it wrought likewiſe upon Petronius, among the Reſt. Now Petronius was a Soft, Good-Natured Perſon, a moderate Man, and a Lover of Truth and Juſtice. And he was ſo far a Friend to the Jews too, that he thought they had Hard Meaſure, and diſcovered his Inclinations in his very Countenance. He obſerved upon ſome Diſcourſe he had with his Fellow Commiſſioners, that the People were mightily come about, and, from violent Prejudices againſt him, to manifeſt Partiality in his Favour. Thus it was, and Petronius was highly pleaſed with That Change of Humour. He was no Stranger all this while to the Impla-

Implacable Spirit of the Emperour, and to the Bitterneſs of his Natural Cruelty; but he ſeemed to act yet, in ſome Meaſure, under a Philoſophical Conduct, and under the Government of a Jewiſh Piety. Whether he did This upon the Old Foundation of a Man trained up to Letters, or of what he had pickt up ſince his coming to the Government of Aſia and Syria where they had Jews in Abundance in all their Towns; or whether he acted as a Man whoſe Genius led him to the Study and Knowledge of Uſeful Things: or whether it be, that God puts Good Things in the Heads of God Men, for the Common Benefit, both of Themſelves, and of the Publique, as it fell out upon This Occaſion. The Statuaries had their Orders to provide as Perfect a Figure, as Art and Hands could make; but for fear of the worſt, to take Time and Care about it, for the longer the Piece was under the Chizel in the making, the longer would the Reputation of it laſt in the World after it ſhould be Finiſhed. Petronius however would not agree upon any Terms to the Jews ſending of an Embaſſy for fear of a Greater Miſchief, in leaving them at the Mercy of a Powerful, a Cruel, and a Phantaſtical Prince. And ſo for either Granting, or Refuſing, he found it Dangerous Both ways. But the way, at laſt, that he pitched upon, was a Letter to Caius, ſetting forth the Pretended Supplications of the Jews, and without any Reflexions upon them, by way of Accuſation and Complaint. The Delay of the Dedication was imputed to the very Nature of the Caſe, and laid at the Workmens Door; who muſt of Neceſſity have ſome certain Space of Time allowed them for the Performance of Covenants: So that Step after Step, One Obſtruction was made the Ground and Pretence of Another; and in This interim, who knew but Caius Himſelf might find it Reaſonable to change his Mind. For Harveſt being juſt now begun, and the Jews in a moſt Outrageous Fit of Deſpair for the Profanation of their Laws and Religion: What if they ſhould have puſhed on this Violence to the Contempt of their Lives, and laid the whole Country waſt, by ſetting Fire to their own Corn, in Revenge! This was no Idle Apprehenſion, and there was early Care taken by Petronius for the Reaping of the Grain, and the Gathering of the Fruits; Partly by way of Prevention, and Partly for a Publique Supply in caſe of Need. For it was at That time in every bodies Mouth, that Caius had ſome thought of a Voyage for Alexandria in Ægypt, though it ſeemed not very likely yet, that ſo great a Prince ſhould expoſe his Perſon to the Difficulties of a Long-Sea, and ſo Prodigious a Train of People along with him; when the way-about by the Coaſts of Aſia and Syria, would have been ſo much a more Commodious Paſſage: Where he might have Embarqued or Diſembarqued at Pleaſure having at Command Two Hundred Long-Boats, for the Uſe and Service of the Coaſts, beſide Veſſels of Burden for the Ocean. Now it was an Abſolute Neceſſity, to ſtore Syria with All Manner of Proviſion from one end of it to the Other; Eſpecially the Towns that lay upon the Sea; and all little enough to anſwer the Neceſſities of the Time, and Place. For there never was ſuch a Multitude of People gotten together, from all Places, and of all Conditions, as upon This Juncture: Men of Honour, Civil and Military, Land and Sea-Officers, and Servants almoſt as many as Soldiers: And all at laſt to be provided for, not as we ſay to keep Life and Soul together, but in a Proportion of State and Plenty, anſwerable to the Dignity of ſo Illuſtrious a Prince.

There was no body doubted, but that the Emperour, upon the Reading of This Letter, would be highly pleaſed both with the Prudence, and the Conduct, even in the very Point of the Delay it ſelf; not for the Jews ſake, but for the Advantage of ſecuring the Fruits, and the Corn. This Letter in fine was approved, and Tranſcribed, and a Meſſenger ſent away in all Poſt-Haſt with a Fair Copy of it. Caius looked as Pale as Death, upon the Reading of it, and ſo ſoon as that Conſcious Hint was a little over, he clapt his Hands, and brake out into a Furious Violence of Words as well as Geſture.

Well, Petronius, ſays the Prince, why thou art the better Man of the Two ſure, and if Petronius will not Hear the Emperor, the Emperor muſt hear Petronius. But thou art ſo puffed up with the Vanity of a Splendid Commiſſion, and a Full Employment, that it looks as if there were not ſuch a Thing as Caius in Nature, but it will not be long before thou art given to underſtand the Contrary. The Greateſt Enemies I have in the World are the Jews; and yet Their Laws are more to thee than the Commands of thy Prince; and what's all This at the Bottom; but that thou art affraid of the Multitude? And what ſignifies That; when thou haſt a Power in thy Hands to encounter the ſtrength of the Kings of Parthia themſelves and the Force of the whole Eaſt. Well but there's Pity in the Caſe too, and at That rate, thy Compaſſion does more with Thee than thy Duty. But what's to be ſaid to the Providence of ſaving the Harveſt? That Frivolous Pretence will coſt you your Head before you are aware; and ſo for your Pretended Care of having Stores in Readineſs for my Voyage, 'tis all of the ſame Batch: For ſuppoſing a Scarcity in Judea, even to the Degree of a Famine, the Neighbouring Provinces, upon upon ſuch a Pinch, would be able to ſupply the Want. But what do I ſtand Talking for, when I ſhould be Doing? Wherefore let This Fellow Feel what he has deſerv'd, without any more Words, and ſo I have done Menacing, but my Indignation Burns on ſtill.

Caius, upon This, made a ſhort Pauſe, and dictated to one of his Secretaries an Anſwer to Petronius, which was in Appearance very much to the Honour of the Governour's Providence and Foreſight. For there were ſome of the Governours he ſtood in Awe of, for fear of their Tampering the People into a Revolt, eſpecially in Large and Populous Provinces, with mighty Armies in them, as in that Tract of Ground along the Euphrates. When he had Cajol'd Petronius for a while, with Formalities of Reſpect, and Fair Words, (but an Implacable Venom under That Cloak) he gave him a Poſitive Command, all other Buſineſs apart, to ſee the Image Dedicated, the Firſt Thing he did: For, ſays he, Harveſt being now over, there is no longer any Colour for a Further Delay.

CHAP. XVI.

King Agrippa comes to Rome; and upon hearing that the Image was to be Conſecrated, he falls into a Swoon; and then coming to himſelf again, he writes to the Prince about it.

SOON after This, came King Agrippa to Rome, to pay his Duty to the Emperour, after his Uſual Manner; but without knowing any Thing as yet of what had paſs'd betwixt Caius and Petronius; only ſomewhat he gather'd however, from an Angry Cloud he ſaw in the Face of Caius, that there was a Storm a coming, though he could not gueſs where it would fall; ſo that he put himſelf to the uttermoſt Scrutiny of Thought, Word, and Deed, to try if he could find himſelf Conſcious of any Thing that might give Offence: but upon ſtanding That Teſt, he concluded, That the Emperour's Diſpleaſure look'd ſome other way, as in Truth it did: But then conſidering afterwards, that the Emperour's Eye was much Fiercer when it was intent upon Him Alone, than when he look'd Another way, he fell again into his Former Apprehenſion. He was thinking many times to ask the Emperour the Reaſon of This Alteration; but then the Curioſity he thought would be ſo Raſh and Unmannerly, that he did not know what Miſchief he might draw upon himſelf by't.

Caius, that was as well read in Faces as any Man, obſerving Agrippa to be Troubled and Uneaſie, laid hold of This Occaſion to break the Ice of the Difficulty. Agrippa, ſays he, you are in Doubt, I perceive, and I am now about to tell you the Thing you ſo much deſire to know. You have not been ſo long about me ſure, as to be now Ignorant, that I Diſcourſe with my Eyes, as well as with my Tongue. The Good People of your Nation are the only Men under the Sun, that Refuſe to own Caius for a God; and in the Contumacy of their Diſobedience, plunge themſelves beyond Redemption into a Certain Death. It is my Poſitive Command to have the Image of Jupiter ſet up in Their Temple, and ſee what Multitudes are gathered together now from all Quarters, under the Pretext of Supplicants and Petitioners; but in effect to Trample my Authority under their Feet.

As he was going forward, King Agrippa was obſerv'd to change Colour all on a ſudden, a Violent Horrour ſeizing him from Head to Foot, a Trembling all over his Body, and his Legs failing him to That Degree, that if By-ſtanders had not ſupported him he muſt have fallen at his Length upon the Ground. He fell, in ſhort, into a Fainting Fit, and in That Condition they carry'd him Home, without any Senſe or Knowledge of what paſs'd.

This Accident, inſtead of working upon the Emperour's Good Nature, ſerv'd only for a further Incentive to his Rage againſt the Jews. Well! ſays Caius, if Agrippa, my Familiar Friend, and one that has receiv'd ſo many Good Offices from me: —— If Agrippa Himſelf, I ſay, has ſo great a Veneration for his Country's Rites and Cuſtoms, as not to endure, ſo much as one Word to their Prejudice, without falling into a Swoon, what Good am I to look for from Others, that have none of theſe Conſiderations to work upon them in my Favour?

Agrippa lay all That Day, and part of the Next, Dozing and Senſleſs, till toward Evening, and then he began to raiſe his Head a little, and with much adoe to open his Eyes, dazling as they were, toward the Company, without knowing one Face that was there preſent. He fell then into ſomewhat a ſounder Sleep, as appear'd by the drawing of his Breath, and the Temper of his Body. When he had lien thus a while, he awak'd, and call'd out to know where he was. Am I with the Emperour, or no; and is he Preſent? Have a Good Heart, they cry'd, for you are at Home, and Caius is not here: You have e'en ſlept long enough, wherefore ſit up a little, and ſee if you know us: here are none but your own People, Friends, Freed-men, Servants, and thoſe that wiſh you well. In fine, the Tenderneſs they expreſſ'd to him in his Diſtreſs, brought him in ſome meaſure to Himſelf again. Upon the Phyſicians ordering the Company to withdraw, that the Patient might be Quiet, and at Liberty for Remedies and Refreſhments: Never trouble your Heads, ſays Agrippa, with Delicacies, for my Palate. A Courſe Diet, and a Good Stomach, is all I ask; and more yet than I ſhould make uſe of, if it were not for the Hopes I have yet left me, of living to be Serviceable, even at the Laſt Extremity, to my Miſerable Country. Theſe laſt Words were accompany'd with Tears, and ſo he took a Repaſt of what was juſt neceſſary to keep him Alive and no more. His Food was Plain and Simple, and his Drink, Water, without one Drop of Wine. And now, ſays he, upon the Finiſhing of his Meal, I have paid a Debt to Nature; ſo that I have nothing more left me to do, but moſt dutifully to Sollicit Caius about the Preſent State of Things. And ſo he call'd for a Tablet, and wrote This Following Letter to the Emperour.

SIR,

"BEtwixt the Fear, and the Reverence I have for your Imperial Majeſty, in the "Dread of your High Diſpleaſure, on the one hand, and in the Veneration I "have for the Dignity of your Sacred Character, on the other; I have rather pre- "ſum'd to lay my Humble Duty at your Majeſty's Feet, in Writing, than to venture "upon it in an Addreſs by Word of Mouth.

"It may be laid down for a Maxim, That all Men living have a Natural Affection "for the Place where they were Born, and an Aweful Reverence for the Laws they "were brought up in: which is a Truth that hath been abundantly aſſerted in the "Piety, Great Prince, of your Profeſſion and Practice. And it is as natural again for "every Man to like his own way beſt whether it be ſo or no; becauſe we are Go- "vern'd in Particular Caſes more by Paſſion, than by Reaſon.

"As to my Self, I ſhall not need to inform you, Sir, That I am by Nation a Jew; "by Birth of Jeruſalem, the Seat of the Holy Temple that ſtands there Dedicated in "a moſt Peculiar Manner to the Honour of the moſt High God. As to my Predeceſ- "ſors, ſome of them have been Kings, others, High-Prieſts, upon which Dignity "they valu'd themſelves more than upon the Authority Royal: computing upon it, "that as God is above Man, ſo the Sacerdotal Character is above the Civil; the One "exerciſing it ſelf in Divine Matters, and the Other only in Humane.

"Now ſuch is the Nearneſs of the Relation I have, and of my manifold Obligati- "ons to This Nation, Country, and Temple, that I cannot but implore your Royal "Grace and Favour on their Behalf. And firſt for the Nation, that they may not be "forc'd over from the Profeſſion of their own Religion, to the Contrary; eſpecially "conſidering how True and Loyal they have ever been to your Illuſtrious Family: no "People under the Heavens ſo Frank of their Vows and Prayers for the Welfare and "Proſperity of your Empire; or ſo Free of their Sacrifices and Oblations; not only "upon Solemn Feſtivals, but Daily: and This not only in Plauſible Words and "Forms, but with a Piety of Reverence and Affection, that came from the very Hearts "and Souls of them; and without any Exception, ſaving only in Caſes of Inconſi- "ſtence, with their Laws and Religion.

"And I have This to ſay further now for the Holy City, and the Place of my Birth: "which is not to be look'd upon as the Metropolis only of Judæa, but of many other "Colonies that have been planted from thence: as Ægypt, Phœnicia, Upper and Low- "er Syria; Pamphylia, Cilicia, and ſeveral Parts of Aſia, as far as Bithynia, and Pon- "tus: and ſo in Europe, there's Theſſaly, Bœotia, Macedonia, Ætolia, Athens, Argos, "Corinth, and the better Part of Peloponneſus: And not only the Continent, but the "Iſlands alſo of moſt Eminent Note are filled with Jewiſh Plantations; as Eubœa, Cy- "prus, Crete; to ſay nothing of Thoſe beyond the Euphrates; For in ſhort, bating "only a ſmall Part of Babylon, and ſome other Governments, there is hardly a City "that is good for any thing, but in the Poſſeſſion of the Jews. So that if This be "the Caſe, I am not a Suitor for my own Country alone, but for the Common Good "of Aſia, Europe, and Africa; Sea and Land; Iſlands and Continent, all under one: "for the Intereſt of the Whole depends upon the ſame Act of Clemency; and I hope "my Confidence will be the more Pardonable, for the Zeal I have to be an Inſtru- "ment in a Mediation ſo much to the Honour of Cæſar. For what can be more A- "greeable to the Spirit and Genius of ſo Glorious a Prince, than the Miniſtring ſo fair "an Occaſion of Obliging the whole World at once; and conſequently, the Perpe- "tuating of your Name and Memory to all Ages, as the Guardian-Angel of Man- "kind.

"You

" You have been pleas'd, at the Requeſt of ſome Particular Friends, to make whole " Towns Free Citizens of Rome; and Maſters of thoſe that were but Servants before; " and in ſo doing, your Kindneſs was as Great to the Procurers of This Bounty, as to " the Receivers of it. I am ſenſible of being under the Command of a Maſter, and " yet give me leave to value my ſelf upon the Title of a Friend too: and a Friend " not Inferior to many in Dignity; but Above all others in Good-Will and Reſpect: " for it has ever been ſo, and in Honour and Gratitude it muſt ever ſo Continue. " And yet after all This, I have not the Confidence to open my Mouth for my " Country-men, for Grants and Privileges; no not ſo much as for the Common " Freedom, or Immunity from Taxes. The Grace that I have to beg would be of " high Advantage to Them, 'tis true, and of no ſort of Inconvenience to Cæſar. For " what greater Bleſſing can a Subject deſire than the Favour of his Prince? Was it " not Jeruſalem that firſt Gratulated the Acceſſion of Caius to the Empire? And was it " not Jeruſalem again, that ſent the Joyful Tidings of it into all the Neighbouring " Provinces? the very Providence of making the Jews ſubſervient to ſuch a Revolu- " tion, may deſerve ſome ſort of Acknowledgment. As the Eldeſt Son of the Fami- " ly is reputed the moſt Honourable, becauſe it was He that firſt entitled his Parents " to the Reverend Names of Father and Mother: So That City, one would think, " that firſt ſaluted Caius by the Name of Emperour, ſhould be Treated, as well, at leaſt, " if not better, than any of the reſt.

" I have been thus far an Advocate for my Country, but my laſt Prayer muſt be for " our Temple. This Temple, Caius, is the Houſe of God, and there was never any " Image made with Hands admitted into't. The works of Painters and Statuaries are " the Figures only of Senſible Gods; but for a Picture-drawer or Engraver to offer at " any ſort of Repreſentation of the Inviſible God, was looked upon as an Abominati- " on. Agrippa, your Grandfather, had a mighty Reverence for This Temple. Au- " guſtus provided expreſly for the Supplying of it with the Firſt-Fruits from all Quar- " ters, and the offering of Daily Sacrifices in it. Your Great Grandmother had like- " wiſe a High Veneration for it. Neither Greek, in fine, nor Barbarian; neither " Prince nor Potentate; no nor the Deadlieſt Enemies we had, Sedition, War, Bon- " dage, Deſolation; or the moſt Deſtructive of other Calamities could ever prevail " upon us to receive the Idol of an Image into the Temple. Not that it had no Ene- " mies, but its Religion was ſafe ſtill; for being dedicated to the Father and Author " of all Things, it ſtruck People into a Dread of the Judgments that frequently attend " ſuch Violations: ſo that they durſt not venture to ſow the Seeds of Wickedneſs, for " fear of Reaping the Fruits of it Themſelves. We ſhall not need to look Abroad for " Inſtances, having ſo many nearer Home.

" In the Reign of Herod, my Grandfather, your Grandfather, Marcus Agrippa paſs'd " the Complement upon him of a Viſit into Judæa, where he coaſted along the Sea- " ſide up to Jeruſalem. Upon the View of the Temple, he was ſo tranſported with the " Glories of the Fabrick; the Solemnities of the Sacerdotal Rites and Ceremonies, the " Simplicity of the Peoples Manners; and in fine, with the Delight of ſo Curious and " Wonderful a Spectacle, that he was never well, but with ſomething or other in his " Mouth to the Honour of that Illuſtrious Structure: inſomuch, that for the Time he " ſtaid there, he never miſs'd ſo much as one Day's Attendance, but ſtill paid his " Conſtant Viſits: entertaining himſelf all the while, in the Contemplation of the " Holy Veſts, the Order of the Sacrifices, and the Aweful Majeſty of the High-Prieſt, " in his Rich Pontifical Robes, as he ſat mounted above the reſt. In fine, when he " had preſented his Donatives to the Holy Temple, and ſhew'd himſelf as Indulgent to " the Citizens as was poſſible, ſaving only an Exemption from Taxes; Herod accom- " pany'd Agrippa to the Sea-ſide, upon his return, where they exchang'd mutual Ac- " knowledgments of the High Obligations they had the one to the other: the People " ſtrewing the Paſſage all the way he went, with Boughs and Flowers, in token of the " Veneration they had for his Piety and Bounty.

" And ſo, Sir, for your Great Uncle Tiberius; was not he manifeſtly of the ſame " Principle and Judgment? Did not our Religion, and our Temple ſtand Firm and Safe, " thorough the whole Three and Twenty Years of Tiberius's Reign, without any ſort of " Innovation? Nay, there is ſomething that I both Can and Muſt ſay to Tiberius's " Honour; though I my ſelf had very hard Meaſure from him. But Truth is Truth, " and I am ſure you will have the Patience to hear it.

" When Pilate was Governour of Judæa, we dedicated to Tiberius certain Gilt Buck- " lers; not ſo much out of Reſpect to the Emperour, as in pure Spite to the Jews; and " they were erected in the Palace of Herod in Jeruſalem. They had no ſort of Figure " upon them, nor any thing that was prohibited, but barely the Two Names of the " Dedicator, and the Perſon to whom they were Dedicated. When this Story came " to be nois'd among the People, they made Application preſently to the King's Four " Sons, with ſome other Branches of the Royal Family, and ſeveral other Perſons of " Eminent Condition, to employ their Intereſt with Pilate to have theſe Bucklers re-

" mov'd, as a Violation of the Laws and Religion of their Country, which Former
" Kings and Emperours had ever reputed Sacred. Pilate, that was Harſh and Croſs-
" grain'd in his own Nature, made the Mediators ſo Rude and Churliſh a Reply to " the Motion, that it put the Multitude into Wild and Diſorderly Exclamations.

" Let People be Quiet, they cry'd, that would be Quiet; without enflaming Men
" to War and Sedition, and to the embroyling of the Publick Peace, as if the Honour
" of the Emperour depended upon the Violation of the Law: never think of Covering " an Injuſtice with ſo weak a Pretext. If you have any thing to ſhew in your Juſti-
" fication, from Tiberius; whether Edict, Letter, or any Thing like it, do but ſhew
" us the Warrant, and we have no more to do, ſave only to Addreſs our ſelves, with " Humble Petitions and Remonſtrances, to our Lord and Maſter, for Redreſs, without " taking any further notice of Pilate: for Tiberius, we are ſure, will never approve " of This Oppreſſion.

" This Phancy of Applying themſelves to Cæſar, by Remonſtrance or Deputation,
" ſtartled Pilate more than any thing elſe, for fear of laying him open to the World
" in the Hiſtory of his Other Iniquities; as Corruption, Juſtice expos'd to Sale, Rapine, " Violence, Ruine, Torments, Innocent Blood, and the moſt Barbarous of Cruelties.
" This Cholerick Angry Man was yet ſo divided within himſelf, that as he had no
" mind to gratify the Subject, ſo he had not the Confidence neither, to withdraw any " thing that was made Sacred by a Dedication; being well acquainted with the Hu" mour of Tiberius in ſuch Caſes over and above. When the Great Men found Mat" ters in This State, and that Pilate repented himſelf of what he had done, however
" he Diſſembled it: They repreſented the Caſe to Tiberius by way of Letter, in the " moſt Tender Dutiful Manner that could be devis'd. Tiberius had no ſooner notice
" of Pilate's Language and Behaviour, but he brake out into a Violent Paſſion, though " a Man not eaſily mov'd neither. But This will do better in the Story it ſelf, than " in a bare Deſcription.

" The Firſt Thing he did was, without any Delay, to write to Pilate about it,
" with a Severe Rebuke for his Impudence, and a Poſitive Command, Immediately
" to Remove the Bucklers, and to have them tranſported into the Temple that was " built at Cæſarea, (a Sea-Port) in Honour of Auguſtus. This Expedient was as good as " a Salvo to the Honour of the Emperour, and the Ancient Cuſtoms of the City. Theſe
" Bucklers, in Thoſe Days, had no Gravers Work upon them; and the Point now in " Queſtion is the Graven Image. It was Then only in the Governour's Palace, but " it is now to be erected, as I am inform'd, in the Sanctuary; a Place ſo Venerable and " Sacred, that only the High-Prieſt is allow'd Entrance; and That but upon One Day
" in the Year too; and after a Solemn Faſt, to burn Incenſe to the Glory of God, and " to offer up Prayers to the Almighty, according to Cuſtom, for a Happy Year, and " the Common Peace of Mankind.

" If any other of our own People, either Prieſt, or Lay-man, ſhall Preſume to enter
" This Holy Place contrary to the Law, it is made Death without Mercy. As for Example;
" If the High-Prieſt ſhall dare to enter above One Day in a Year, or Three or Four Times
" over, for the purpoſe, upon That Day of his Entrance, it will moſt certainly coſt
" him his Life: So Tender was our Lawgiver, of preſerving the Reverence of That " Holy Place, Sacred and Inviolate. Now if the Rigour was ſo Strict and Capital, in " Theſe Nice Caſes, you may eaſily imagine, Sir, what an Uproar it would create
" to have an Image ſet up There, where the High-Prieſt himſelf was not to be admit- " ted but upon certain Limitations. How many of our Prieſts would Sacrifice Them-
" ſelves, their Wives and Children, in one Common Pile of Carcaſſes, rather than out-
" live the Sight and Sufferance of ſuch an Abomination.

" This was the Caſe in the Days of Tiberius. And now for Auguſtus, the Beſt
" and the Greateſt Prince that ever ſat upon the Imperial Throne; his very Name be" ing given him out of a Deference to his Conduct and Virtue; a Prince, to whom
" the whole World was indebted for the Bleſſing of an Univerſal Peace. This Illu-
" ſtrious Prince, upon ſome Diſcourſe he had concerning our Temple, was given to " underſtand, that no Carved Image was ſuffer'd to be brought into't, and for this " very Reaſon, that the Inviſible God was not to be repreſented by a Viſible Figure.
" Upon which he was highly pleas'd with the Reaſon, and the Piety of the Thing;
" and being a Prince moreover of Profound Literature Himſelf, he paſs'd ſeveral Re" flections upon what had been ſaid: partly recollecting what he had heard from " the Learned Men he had conſtantly about him, and partly agitating the Matter in " his own Thoughts. He was, in fine, ſo great a Lover of Letters, that his very

Table-

" Table-Diſcourſes were as Good as Philoſophy-Lectures, and his Feſtival Entertain" ments were accommodated to the Relief and Satisfaction both of Body and Mind.
" Not to multiply Inſtances, in Proof of This Prince's Generoſity and Good-Will to" ward our People, I ſhall make uſe only of Two.

" Firſt, upon Notice that there was not ſuch Care taken for the Return of our " Firſt-Fruits as the Matter requir'd, the Emperour wrote to the Governours of the " Provinces in Aſia, not to give any ſort of Interruption to the Jews meeting in their " Synagogues, (but This Liberty was not to extend to any other.) For the Jews Meet- " ings are not like the Feaſts of Bacchus, to encourage Drunkenneſs and Sedition, but " Schools rather, of Piety and Common Juſtice. And ſo for their Yearly Firſt-Fruits,
" they were only intended for Sacrifices to be offer'd up to God in the Temple. This " was follow'd with an Expreſs Command, not to put the Jews to any Trouble about " their Meetings or Collections, after the Manner of their Country. I may miſtake the " Words of the Order, but the Subſtance of it I am ſure of, as your Majeſty will find
" in a Letter from Norbanus, whereof This is a True Copy.

C. Norbanus Flaccus, Proconſul to the Magiſtrate of Epheſus, Greeting.

" Cæſar has ſignify'd unto me by Letter, That whereas the Jews continue their Old " Way of Religious Meetings, and of Gathering Monies to be ſent to Jeruſalem, under " the Name of Firſt-Fruits, It is his Imperial Majeſty's Will and Pleaſure, That they be
" all left at Liberty ſo to do. Of This you are to take Notice, and to pay your Obedience
" accordingly.

" What Clearer Evidence, under Favour, can there be in the World, of Cæſar's " Opinion of our Temple, than the indulging of the Jews in the Publick Exerciſe of " their Worſhip; the Freedom of their Collections for Holy Uſes, and the Counte-
" nancing of them in other Offices of Piety.

" And there is yet Another Argument of the Good-Will that Auguſtus bare us: that " is to ſay; He order'd the Daily Sacrifice of a Bull and Two Lambs, out of his own
" Revenue, to be offer'd up to the Honour of Our God: and the Practice of it hath " been kept up ever ſince to This very Day, without any Diſcontinuance. This Obla-
" tion, Cæſar deſign'd for the Altar, and yet he very well underſtood that there was " no Image in the Caſe, either within, or without. But This Wiſe and Learned
" Prince was nevertheleſs Convinc'd of the Neceſſity of having ſome Glorious Temple
" upon Earth, dedicated in a Peculiar Manner to the Inviſible God; where Men
" might offer up their Devotions in Hope of having their Prayers Heard and Grant" ed, and without any Viſible Figure.

" And now, with your Majeſty's leave, yet once again. What did your Great " Grandmother the Empreſs Julia, but write after the Copy of her Great Maſter and " Husband, Auguſtus, in the Profuſion of her Royal Bounties upon This Temple; as " Veſſels of Gold and Silver, with other Ornaments and Preſents to an Ineſtimable Va" lue. But to what End was all this without Image-work? For Women's Minds are " commonly weak, and hard to be wrought upon, ſave only by Senſible Objects.
" But for this Princeſs however, that was as much beyond other Women, in a Maſ-
" culine Vigour of Perſpicacity and Judgment, as in all other Excellencies, ſhe ſup-
" ply'd the Failings of the Sex, by Study and Meditation, and gave her ſelf up ſo
" entirely to Thought and Speculation, that ſhe look'd upon the Practical Part to be " only a Shadow of the other.

" And now, Great Sir, after ſo many Glorious Inſtances of Tenderneſs and Clemen" cy out of your own Family, and Thoſe of your Anceſtor in Particular, from whom " you have receiv'd both your Life and Government, be but ſo Gracious toward our " People, as your Predeceſſors have been, every Man of them before you. Here are " Emperours interceding for our Laws to an Emperour; ſeveral Auguſt Princes, to One;
" Grandfathers and Great Grandfathers, to a Grandchild; Many to a Single Perſon, &c.
" And what's the Requeſt at laſt, but This? They do All humbly beg of you, not to " make void thoſe Laws and Cuſtoms, that from their Firſt Eſtabliſhment have been kept " Sacred to This very Day. Theſe Acts, 'tis true, may be vacated, and Theſe Inno" vations wrought perhaps, without any Judicial Vengeance to tread upon the Heels
" of the Tranſgreſſion: But whoever conſiders the Uncertainty of the Future, and that " Divine Juſtice is nevertheleſs Sure for being ſometimes Slow; it will make his Heart
" ake to think of the Conſequences, if at the ſame time he believes there is a God.

" If I ſhould take upon my ſelf now to enumerate the Infinite Obligations I have " to your Majeſty, my Time would not ſerve me to recount them; neither would it
" become me to handle ſo ſacred a Subject, as by the Bye. But the Thing ſpeaks it ſelf

" without

" without telling the Story. It is no Secret, Sir, that I was in Irons, and that I ſtand " indebted to your ſelf for my Liberty, but I hope you did not Eaſe me of Thoſe Chains, " to Load me with Heavier inſtead of them. In That Caſe, my Suffering was only in " One Part of my Body; but in This, my very Soul ſinks under the Burden. You " did Firſt deliver me from the Dread of Death, and you Revived me Afterwards " out of Death it ſelf, ſo that Agrippa deſires no more now than that Cæſar would " Preſerve the Life he has Reſtored: for otherwiſe, I have only out-lived a Leſs " Calamity to Periſh by a Greater.

" It is to your Royal Bounty that I am a Debtor for the Gift and Dignity of a " Crown; and after That, for the Addition of Another and a Greater Command, in " Trachonitis, and Galilee. But after the Multiplying of ſo many Extraordinary Fa- " vours upon me, do not Deprive me, I beſeech you, of things the moſt Ne- " ceſſary of all others. I am not Solicitous for fear of either Loſing my Com- " miſſion, or of being Degraded into my Former Station, but my Requeſt is, once " for all, that the Laws of my Country may be protected, and maintained. For what " will the World ſay of me elſe, either Jews, or Others? Now One of Theſe Two " Things muſt neceſſarily follow: either I ſhall be lookt upon as a Betrayer of my " Country, or as a Perſon utterly loſt to the Honour of your Friendſhip: and " what could make me more miſerable than either of them. For ſuppoſing my ſelf " to be ſtill in the number of your Confidents, and at the ſame time to ſuffer my " Country to go to Wrack, I muſt certainly incur the Character of a Falſe Man, " for employing my Intereſt no better upon a Preſumption that Emperours and " Princes deny no ſuch Boons to their Favourites. Or if I ſhould be ſo Unhappy " now, as to have loſt the Bleſſing of your Tenderneſs, and Good Graces, do not " lay me in Chains I beſeech you, as Tiberius did, but inſtead of my Liberty, pray " take away my Life, This very Moment, and That's all I ask. For what ſignifies " Life to me after the Loſs of your Friendſhip: Which is the only Hope, and " Comfort I had in This World.

CHAP. XVII.

Caius, upon Agrippa's Letter, Orders Petronius to make no Alteration in the Temple of Jeruſalem. He Repents of it, and Countermands his Own Order. He goes to Alexandria, and claims Divine Worſhip. The Inhumane Cruelties of This Prince.

Agrippa Seals up and ſends away his Letter to Caius; and after That keeps cloſe in his own Houſe expecting in Great Pain the Iſſue of That Paper, and under an Anxious Apprehenſion for fear the Importunity might be unſeaſonable; for the Liberty, and Safety, not only of Judæa, but of all the Jews over the Face of the Earth, were at Stake upon it.

Upon the reading of This Letter, Caius diſcover'd in his Countenance ſeveral Motions, and Changes of Thought and Humour: one while he was vexed that he had not gone thorough with his Work; Another while he ſeemed to be moved with the Juſtice of the Pretence, and the Modeſty of the Application. And then again, he would be Deſcanting by Fits upon Agrippa's Conduct, ſometimes Commending and ſometimes Blaming him. He did ill, he ſaid, in being ſo Zealous for his Country-men, whom he knew to be the Greateſt Enemies in Nature to the Conſecration that was then in Queſtion: but then it was Frank, and Generous, he ſaid, to Own his Opinion and to act according to his Judgment. Theſe Deliberations brought Caius into a better Temper, and drew this Anſwer from him. That upon the Inſtance of Agrippa, he was prevailed upon to Countermand the Dedication; writing at the ſame time to Petronius the Governour of Syria, not to ſuffer any Innovations in the Jews Temple. But leaſt the Prohibition ſhould be more effectual than he intended it, there went a Menace along with it in the ſame Letter to qualifie the Obligation: And it ran in Theſe Words. " Always provided that if any Perſon whatſoever ſhall preſume to obſtruct or oppoſe the Dedication of any Altars, Temples, or Images, to the Honour of our Royal Self or Family, in any Town, City, or Other Place whatſoever, the Metropolis of Jeruſalem only excepted, every ſuch Perſon ſo offending, ſhall be either Puniſh'd upon the Place, in the very Act of his Inſolence, or otherwiſe remitted to our Imperial Will and Pleaſure to be dealt withal according to Juſtice.

This Clauſe was effectually an Abrogating of the Grant; and no other than the Doing and Undoing of a Thing, by a ſide-Wind, in the ſame Breath: Beſide that it tended naturally to the drawing on of a Civil War, for every Body expected that the Enemies of the Jews would fill the whole Country with their Sacrilegious Abomi-

Abominations, not ſo much out of Reſpect to Caius, as out of Malice to us: And then the Jews Themſelves, they thought, on the other Hand, would never have the Patience to endure the ſight of Theſe Prophanations: So that upon the leaſt Provocation of a Tumult, the Image would have been Commanded up again. But Divine Providence had ſo ordered it, that the People were all Quiet, beyond expectation; and without giving the leaſt Occaſion for ſuch a Broyle. They were Quiet, 'Tis true; and little the better for it, ſo long as Caius continued as Buſie and Troubleſome as ever he was, repenting himſelf of his very Charity, and Complyance; and reviving the Violence of his Former Rigour. There was now no longer any Talk of the Statue at Sidon, for fear of enflaming the Multitude: But there was Another beſpoken at Rome: of Copper, Guilt, and Care taken for ſending it away by Sea, ſo Privately that it ſhould be ſet up in the Temple before People were aware. But this was to be done as by Chance, upon the Occaſion of Caius's Voyage into Ægypt.

Now Caius's Heart being mightily ſet upon a Viſit to Alexandria, he ſpared for no Coſt for the Convenience of his Paſſage, upon a Phancy that this was the propereſt Place in the World for the Advancing of his Ridiculous Deſign; in reſpect both of the Authority and Example of That Leading City, and likewiſe in Regard of the Situation of it, for an Univerſal Commerce: For 'tis commonly with Towns, as it is with Men, the Leſs take their Meaſures from the Greater: Beſides that he was in his own Nature, Fickle, and Malicious, over and above.

He ſet ſome Priſoners at Liberty once, and ſoon after clapt them up again; without the leaſt Colour of any other Reaſon for it, than to make their Condition Twenty times more Miſerable and Hopeleſs than it was before.

Others, that expected to Die, were only Baniſhed, and they took it for ſo much clear Gain, to come off ſo; not that they were Conſcious of any Crime to deſerve it, Great or Small; but they found themſelves in the Hands of an Unjuſt, and an Unmerciful Judge. Theſe People, in fine, went into Baniſhment with as good a Will as Others commonly Return Out of it, and behaved Themſelves with as much Honour and Bravery in their Exile, as if they had been at Freedom in their own Houſes. But it was not long yet, before Caius cut them off every Man of them, by a Military Execution, without ſo much as aſſigning any Cauſe of Offence, which put all the Noble Families in Rome into Mourning, for the Loſs of their Friends, and Relations by ſo ſurpriſing an Aſſaſſination.

And if he parted with Money, at any time, he would neither own it as a Gift, nor as a Loan, upon Conſideration of Intereſt, but ſtill find ſome way or other to Recover it, as a Fraud, or as a Theft, to the utter undoing of him that received it. And it was not enough neither to Force Back what he had Given, unleſs the whole Eſtate Hereditary and Acquired went long with it.

But for Thoſe more particularly that valued themſelves upon the Honour and Reputation of his Favour, he found out Ways to undoe them with Complements, and Fair Words, under the very Pretext and Countenance of That Friendſhip. And This was done by putting them upon Vaſt Expence in Treats and entertainments, and Squandring away their Fortunes in Luxury and Riot, to the Degree ſometimes of Devouring a Conſiderable Eſtate at a Meal, and a Deſperate Debt at the end on't never to be Repaid. This way of Proceeding made all his Plauſible Appearances look liker Baits and Snares, than Obligations, and People were ſo far from Courting his Good Graces, that they were directly affraid of them.

This was his Temper, and Conduct, Variable, and Violent; toward the Jews eſpecially, who of all Mortals were the moſt his Averſion. He Began his Freak at Alexandria, with the Seiſure of their Oratories, where he erected Statues and Images to his own Honour, inſtead of the other, and not One Soul to Diſpute the Authority, and the Violence of the action. The Temple of the Holy City was now the only remaining Sanctuary the Jews had left them; and Caius had the Confidence to attempt the Appropriating, even of That alſo to his own Uſe and Service under the Title of,

The Temple of the New Jupiter, the Illuſtrious Caius.

Was there ever ſuch a Piece of Nonſenſical Arrogance? Here is, in the Firſt place, a MAN ſetting up for a GOD: And a MAN, in the next place, that has the World at his Feet already, and is not yet Satisfied, unleſs he may be Maſter of the Heavens too. Is the Almighty to have no part then in a World of his Own Creation? Not ſo much as a Field, a City or a Temple? Not the leaſt Print or Foot-Step of any Place ſet apart for the Service of the True God. Well Caius! Little do you think what what Miſeries you are now drawing upon your ſelf, and your Empire, in this Execrable Project of yours: a Thing Impious, and Impracticable, in the very Nature of it, and not to be ſo much as Thought of without Horrour.

CHAP. XVIII.

Caius's Barbarous Treatment of Philo, and the Other Embaſſadors of the Alexandrian Jews.

WE ſhall come now to ſome Particulars that we both Saw, and Heard, about the Subject of the Embaſſy, when we firſt entered upon This Commiſſion. We were no ſooner entered the Preſence, but Caius gave us to underſtand, in the Fierceneſs of his Looks, Words, and Actions, what we were to expect, and that He was not there, as a Judge, but as an Accuſer rather and a Party. For a Fair and an Impartial Judge would have examined the Matter in Counſel; ſifted it from Point to Point; heard Both ſides Indifferently in their Turns, and upon Advice with the Commiſſioners, have paſſed Sentence in Open Court: All This and more would have been done in Form, eſpecially in a Caſe of This Conſequence, where the Lives and Liberties of ſo many Thouſand Alexandrian Jews were all at Stake; and the Matter ſo Clear, that for Four Hundred Years it had never been ſo much as called in Queſtion. But ſo far was This Unmerciful Tyrant from Complying with the Ordinary Methods of Law and Juſtice, that on the contrary, he treated us with a Paſſionate Brutality of Inſolence and Contempt, below the Baſeſt of Slaves.

Mæcenas, and Lamias had Two Gardens betwixt the Palace and the Town which for Three or Four Days now had been Caius's Retreat. This was the Place it ſeems that Caius had deſigned for the Tragedy of the Jews, and We our ſelves to be the Spectators. Caius ſends for the Gardeners, and bids them ſet all the doors open, for he had a mind to take the Air, and entertain himſelf with the Curioſities of the Place; ordering them likewiſe at the ſame time, to take us along with them. Upon This, we were introduced, and caſting our ſelves upon our Faces at the Emperours Feet, we made our humble Addreſs to him in the ſtyle of Emperour, and Auguſtus. Caius returned the Reſpect in ſuch a manner, as gave us to underſtand, that not only our Cauſe, but our Lives alſo were in Danger. Well! Says Caius with a Grin, And have you the Impudence to diſpute a Divinity that all the World Acknowledges, and to ſet up a Nameleſs God againſt Caius, like an Execrable Race of Wretches as you are! With That Word, he brake out into a Blaſphemous Violence, and ſtretching out his Hands into the Air, uttered ſuch Words as are not ſo much as to be Heard, much leſs Repeated by any Creature that Believes there is a God. But theſe Outragious Indignities were looked upon by the Other ſide as the Prognoſticks of a Certain Victory, and there was not One Attribute ſo Peculiar to God Himſelf, but they aſcribed indifferently to Caius.

There was one Iſidore ſtanding by then; a Crafty, Inſinuating Fellow. This Iſidore, finding Caius ſo well pleaſed with Theſe Execrable and Unnatural Flatteries, put in a Word here to his Purpoſe. If you did but know Sir, ſays he, the Mortal Hatred that Theſe People, and the whole Body of them have for your Imperial Majeſty, you would abhor them ten times more than you do. When the whole World was offering up their Vows and Prayers for the Safety of your Perſon, and the Proſperity of your Government, Theſe were the only Men ſtood out. When I ſay [THESE] I mean All the Jews without Exception. Upon the Hearing of This Calumny, we all cryed out unanimouſly to Caius, " Sir, We are Slandered and Belyed. " We have had our Hecatombs, and our Sacrifices in Form, for the Happyneſs of Caius " and the Empire, and after the Sprinkling of the Altar with the Blood of the Victims, " we did not carry the Fleſh Home with us and make a Feaſt of it among our ſelves, " as many other People do, but commit the Sacrifice, Whole to the Sacred Fire. And " This we have done upon Three Remarkable Occaſions. Firſt, upon your Majeſty's Acceſſion to the Imperial Thrones; ſecondly, upon your Recovery out of " That Deſperate Fit of ſickneſs when ſo many Nations were in Tears and Morning " for you. And Thirdly, when we offered up our Vows and Prayers for the Succeſs of your Armies in Germany.

'Tis Right, ſays Caius like a Hair-Brain'd Mad-Man, you did Sacrifice, but it was to Another not to Me, and what am I the better for your Sacrificing to Another? This Blaſphemous Outrage ſtruck us with a Trembling all over, and Chill'd the very Blood in our Veins; but Caius went on however in the mean time, in a Formal way of taking a View of all the Appartments from the Common Offices to the Treating ing Rooms, and ſo from Top to Bottom, taking notice all the while where he found any Thing amiſs, and how he would have it mended. And ſtill as Caius went ſauntring up and down, we follow'd him, only to make Sport for the Company, by the Railery and Contempts they put upon us, to furniſh Matter for a Farce: as the whole Contrivance was in truth but a Scene upon the Stage, where the Judge Perſonated the Accuſer, and the Accuſers repreſented an Unjuſt Judge: And it was all but Faction and Malice, without any ſemblance of Truth. But being now at the Mercy of ſuch a Judge and ſuch an Enemy, both in one, we had no Defence left us but Silence: eſpecially when we had nothing to ſay we could be the better for, on the One ſide, beſide the endangering of the Main Cauſe on the Other.

When Caius had now given ſome Neceſſary Orders about the Buildings; he put it to us in a Grave Formal Way; Pray ye, ſays he, how come you to make ſuch a Conſcience about the Eating of Swine's Fleſh? This Queſtion put the Company into Another Fit of Laughing, partly as they were pleas'd with the Mockery, partly as they were tickled with the Conceit; and in part, to curry Favour with their Maſter for liking the ſame Things that he did. Now ſome of the very Family, that were better read in Good Manners than their Fellows, cry'd out, Shame at the Sawcineſs of the Frolick, in the Preſence of the Prince: for Theſe Liberties, they ſaid, were not either Safe or Warrantable, but among Familiar Friends and Equals.

But now to the Queſtion concerning Swine's Fleſh; our Anſwer was, That ſeveral People and Places have their ſeveral Faſhions and Cuſtoms, and our Adverſaries are prohibited the Uſe of ſome Things, as well as we are the Uſe of Others. Well! ſays one of the Company, but I have known ſome People that would not eat Mutton. Very Good, ſays Caius merrily, and I cannot Blame them neither, for it is an Unſavoury Diſh. This Bantering way of Ridiculing us, was but adding Affliction to Affliction, but in the End, Caius call'd out to us in a Peeviſh Paſſion. Hark ye, ſays he, I would fain know what Title you have among you to the City Privileges and Freedom you make ſuch a Talk of? We enter'd immediately upon the opening of the Cauſe. But Caius, finding himſelf already pinch'd in what he had heard, and in Danger to be more put to't in what was to follow, cut the Speech ſhort, and ſtarting up on a ſudden, took a Run into the Great Hall, and when he had walk'd a while there, from one place to another, he order'd the Windows to be ſhut. The Glaſs was as Clear as Chryſtal, and ſo Fram'd, as indifferently to keep the Wind and the Sun out, and to let the Light in. He came after This to us, upon a Gentle Pace, and after a Sober Faſhion, ask'd us, What we had to ſay. We were ſtill for ſhortening the Caſe, and away runs Caius once again, into another Chamber, where he had a Collection of Ancient Paintings of the Greateſt Maſters, carefully Depoſited. Theſe Interruptions and Diſappointments, one upon the Neck of another, made us ſo Sick and Weary of our Vexatious and Servile Attendances; and ſo Hopeleſs withall, that we look'd for nothing but Death. In This Anxiety of Thought we betook our ſelves to the True God with Prayers and Supplications to Defend us from the Rage and Menaces of the God Falſly ſo call'd; who in Compaſſion to his Servants mitigated the Perſecutor's Fury: So that Caius without any more Outrage, paſs'd only This Short Reflection upon us: Theſe Men, ſays he, that will not Believe me to be a God, are in my Opinion rather Miſerable than Wicked: and with Thoſe Words Caius Retir'd and order'd us alſo to withdraw.

After our Deliverance from This Judgment, or I might have ſaid, This Priſon or Theatre, we got a little Breathing-while. It makes me think of a Theatre, for we were Ridicul'd, Flouted, and Hiſs'd at like ſo many Buffoons upon a Stage; and Treated otherwiſe like Priſoners, but with Torments of Soul over and above, not to be expreſs'd, in the Horrid Blaſphemies we were forc'd to be Ear-Witneſſes of, and under the Outrages of a Powerful and Inhumane Prince. And what was the Ground of his Implacable Rage againſt us, but that the Jews were the only People in the World that refus'd to own Him for a God. We do not ſpeak This as Men afraid of Death, for the Love of Life; but on the contrary, we ſhould have counted it as the Greateſt of Bleſſing, if it might but have advanc'd the Common Cauſe of our Profeſſion. But in This Caſe, our Deſtruction would have been evidently the Scandal, if not the Ruine of our whole Party: for the Miſcarriages of Deputies are commonly imputed to the Ill Conduct of their Principals. This Thought made us the more ſenſible of any thing that would look like a Deliverance; beſide the Anxious Uncertainty we were in, to conſider, what Sentence the Emperour might think fit to pronounce, upon the Iſſue: for what could he ſay to the Merits of the Cauſe without hearing the Particulars. Would it not have been a Hard Caſe for all the Jews upon the Face of the Earth to be treated after the Precedent of their Five Emperours? for if Caius ſhould Gratify the Alexandrians, we ſhould never be Quiet any where elſe. We ſhould have had neither Friends, nor Towns, nor Oratories left: neither Laws, Rites, nor Privileges, but all ſwallow'd up in Ruine and Confuſion, and no Remedy but to ſink at laſt under the Burden of an Inſupportable Oppreſſion. We were reduc'd, in fine, to the laſt Extremity of a Miſerable Deſpair; abandon'd by our Temporizing Friends, and Diſown'd effectually by Thoſe we moſt depended upon: who knew well enough the Paſſions he had for the Vanity of being taken for a God.
